THE EXCISE DUTY UPON PAPER.

All men are agreed that taxation is an evil. The hardiest of disputants, who would deny any other self-evident proposition, would stop short at a denial of this. There needs no ghost to inform the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he who can so place this necessary burden as to make its weight most easily borne by the community, and to interfere in the least possible degree with the business, the health, the comfort, and the enlightenment, both physical and intellectual, of the people, would be the greatest man of his class, and the most valuable of public benefactors. Unluckily, it is more easy to complain of a bad tax than to invent a substitute. But, as it is no part of the business of a people to offer its back to the load, and say to its rulers, "Come, tax me," the invention of taxation must be left to statesmanship. The people have but to confine themselves to their legitimate province of remonstrance against hardship and wrong. If the wearer of the tight financial shoe does not cry out, how is the fiscal cobbler to fit him more comfortably?

Taxation in Great Britain is a thing so complicated; so productive upon articles that ought never to have been taxed at all; so injurious to the operations of trade and commerce in many of their most important branches; so vexatious and inquisitorial into the private affairs of men engaged in business; so partial in the burdens that it imposes upon rich and poor; so wasteful both in its collection and in its expenditure, as to task the highest legislative capacities to reduce it into system, or to devise any scheme to render it not simply inoppressive, but tolerable. The whole tendency of public opinion, in recent times, as well as the whole course of our legislation, has been to substitute direct for indirect taxation; to levy a percentage from all property and from all income, and to leave trade and commerce unfettered by duties and restrictions. Had such been our fiscal policy a century ago, it would have been a fortunate thing for this country. The bitter pill of taxation would not have been swallowed with complacency; and, having to pay their own wars out of their own tills, our ancestors would have stopped short in their furious career of extravagance, before they had overwhelmed themselves and their posterity with the astounding debt of eight hundred millions of pounds sterling. Between the years 1793 and 1815 alone, a debt of £529,077,296 was contracted by our valiant forefathers. If they had been obliged to pay the whole sum in ready money to the Income-tax collector for the indulgence of their warlike propensities, they would have opened their eyes to the advantages and the beauty of Peace, and rendered the task of Government much easier for all future statesmen than it is likely to be as long as such a millstone hangs upon the neck of the public energy.

It will be the principal business of the Legislature in Great Britain for many years to come, to minimize and re-distribute the taxation of the country. The financial Hercules who shall cleanse this Augean stable is "the coming man" of whom the Caucasian prophet has spoken. As yet, there are no signs of his approach; but the public mind is ripe and ready to receive him. If he succeed in abolishing the Exciseman, public gratitude will owe him a brilliant page in history, and a national statue to transmit his form and features to the latest posterity.

Sir Robert Peel, beyond all exception the greatest financial reformer the country has yet seen, did much, by his famous measure which prepared the way for the abolition of the Corn Laws, to reduce the business of this troublesome functionary. His utter extinction is too much to hope for. That he should put his fingers into our malt and our alcohol, is an evil that we may endure, since he picks up for us, by that means, no less a sum, for England, Scotland, and Ireland, than £4,993,235 per annum by his percentage upon our beer; and £5,241,572 by the tribute levied upon our gin and our whiskey. Ten millions and a quarter derivеable from such sources are not to be dispensed with as long as any necessity shall exist for taxation at all. But a densely-peopled country like this may fairly ask its rulers to relieve it from the visits of the Exciseman upon the two articles of soap and paper, both of which administer to the comfort, the morality, and the enlightenment of the great bulk of the community. To tax drunkenness is proper, but to tax cleanliness and knowledge is a mistake and an oppression; while neither tax is so productive as to make it worth the while of a Government to maintain it.

We have never yet seen a defence of either of these imposts; but the necessities of the State are such, that they will doubtless be allowed to continue as long as the public shall manifest any quiescence under the hardship which they inflict. But, although the Excise duty upon soap seems at first to be of even more importance to the comfort and welfare of the poorer classes than the fellow-burden inflicted upon paper, we are of opinion that the last-mentioned is, in reality, the more injurious of the two to a larger variety of interests. To say nothing of the paper-maker himself, who carries on a branch of industry that might, if unfettered, give employment to large numbers of the people; we have the rag-merchant, the mate's the bookseller, bookbinder, the journalist, the author, the printer, the type-founder, and a whole host of others whose daily bread depends more or less upon the manufacture and the due supply of that beautiful article, paper. Nor is it these alone who are injured. Every grocer who wraps his sugar, his tea, or his spices in a parcel —every tradesman who uses packing-paper—every merchant who keeps a ledger—every man who buys a book or a newspaper—every person, male or female, young or old, who writes a letter of business or affection is affected by the duty on paper. The seaman to the paper-mill. The duty amounts to three-halfpence per pound upon all descriptions of paper, without reference to quality, and has been estimated to fall in the following proportions, as regards value, upon the various kinds of paper that come under its operation:—

On thin foreign correspondence paper	.. ..	½ per cent.
On printing paper	.. .. ..	33½ "
On millboard, &c.	.. .. ..	66⅔ "
On brown wrapping paper	.. .. ..	74 "

Thus, the retail trader, the shipper, and the manufacturer, of all kinds and degrees, suffer in the greatest proportion, next to the paper-maker himself; the bookbinder, the artist, and the card-maker in the next; authors, booksellers, publishers, journalists, and all connected, however remotely, with the businesses of literature and printing, in the third degree; and last of all, those whose sole expenditure for paper is for the purposes of correspondence. The tax is therefore not alone a tax upon literature, but an impediment in the way of trade in a thousand ramifications. It is a tax upon news—a tax upon learning—a tax upon history—a tax upon philosophy—a tax upon imagination—a tax upon education; and, what many minds will consider far more grievous than all the rest, it is a tax upon the use and the distribution of the Bible.

Most people will remember the illustrations given by Sir Robert Peel, of the vexatious interference of the Excise man in preventing the skill, the energy, and enterprise of Englishmen from directing themselves to the manufacture of the beautiful article of glass—restrictions which had not only rendered glass the luxury of the rich, instead of making it the convenience of the poor, but which had given other countries a pre-eminence which might have been attained by ourselves. The vexatious interference with the manufacture of paper is equally prejudicial in this respect. In Russia, in Sweden, and some other continental countries, there are no restrictions, and no prying Excisemen. The consequence is, that English capitalists, with a knowledge of the paper manufacture, transfer their capital and their energies to other fields, where they may be more productive, to the manifest loss and detriment of the land of their birth. These, however, are but a few of the evils consequent upon this impost. To run over the whole catalogue, and expatiate upon each, would more than exhaust our limits. We trust, however, that we have said enough to draw the attention of our readers to the subject, and to show that this tax is not a mere matter of the shop to one particular trade or pursuit, but one which affects the whole people, in their morals, their education, and their religion, as well as in their industry. The amount of revenue derived from it is comparatively small; the amount of mischief inflicted by it is almost incalculable.

LONDON ICE-CARTS.

IF proof were wanting of the world's progress in luxurious arts, it might be found in the various use of ice in domestic economy, which has, of late years, so increased as to have given rise to a branch of commerce known as "the Ice-Trade." Meanwhile, Science has lent her aid to the refinement, in multiplying the means of producing artificial cold with the rapidity of machinery; yet, the demand for the natural material has, from year to year, vastly increased in spite of this forced supply.

London receives annually her cargoes of crystal ice from Wenham Lake—a trade, if we mistake not, first illustrated and described in this Journal. Norway and Sweden likewise send to us their shiploads; and the importation thence is stated within the past year to have been greater than that of former years.

The Illustration upon the preceding page shows the ready means of our native supply; and a sharp frost almost as invariably brings out a host of the little carts there depicted, as a frozen dikehdh raises the price of coals. The ponds in the neighbourhood of the metropolis yield the ice to these motley merchants, who are mostly small carriers, greengrocers, fishmongers, &c. The trade rises and falls with the weather: each cart holds from 1½ to 2 cwt. of ice, which, in cheap seasons, brings the finder but half-a-crown; still, in mild winters, the same quantity has been known to realise fourteen shillings. Upon frosty mornings you see a string of these carts depositing their loads at confectioners', fishmongers', and clubhouses. For example, on Thursday morning several ice-carts might have been seen at the County Service Club (late Crockford's), in St. James's-street, unloading the raw material for enabling the sons of luxury to slake their thirst during the next London season.

The ice is stored in large wells, of which wholesale dealers possess several in various parts of the environs: we have seen at one well in St. John's-wood a string of sixty or seventy carts waiting to discharge their loads; and, in the course of a morning, more than two hundred such loads have been deposited.

The scene of the collection of the ice, as well as its conveyance, has its humours; and the latter are made cleverly characteristic by the comic pencil of the Artist of the previous Engraving.

Ice is not only employed in the composition of various refreshments, but also to preserve viands which best tends to deteriorate; and sometimes it is used as a therapeutic agent in illness. With all our increasing facilities for the supply, we have it not so cheaply as in New York, where the day's supply is sold from door to door. The North American export ice trade has been very profitable. The plan is, to use a substitute for ballast, and to fill the vessel with ice from top to the hold; they are then covered with saw-dust, straw, and charcoal-dust: and thus the ice is imported into the West India Islands. Naples is supplied with ice made from snow, obtained from reservoirs in the lava of Vesuvius. Rome is similarly furnished from Soracte, as it was nearly 2000 years since:—

"Stet nive geldum Soracte."

BURNING WATER INSTEAD OF LAMP OIL.—The New York Sun has a letter from Worcester, Massachusetts, in which the writer claims to have invented and put in use an apparatus which separates the oxygen of which water is composed, and produces gases for lights. This it does at no other expense than that of the machinery—as no material but water is used. The water is decomposed by a current of electricity, evolved by the apparatus. The labour of five minutes, once in two hours in the day, in winding up the machine, is all that is required to produce two hundred and fifty cubic feet of gas. The expense of the machine is three hundred dollars, and it can be carried by a man under his arm. Such is the description of it. Time will determine whether it is even so.

WEIGHING DEPARTMENT OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—One of the most interesting and astonishing departments within the wide compass of the Bank of England is the weighing department, in which, with the rapidity of thought, and a precision approaching to the hundredth part of a grain, the weight of the gold coins are determined. There are six weighing machines, kept working by the same agency which applies all the mechanical power in the bank, and three weighers attend to these. Rolls of sovereigns, or half-sovereigns, are placed in grooves, and are shaken, one at a time, by the motion of the machine, into the scale. If they are of standard weights they are thrown by the same mechanical intelligence into a box at the right hand side of the person who watches the operation; if they have lost the hundredth part of a grain, they are cast into a box on the left. These which stand the test are put into bags of 1000 sovereigns each, and those below par are cut by a machine, and sent back to the Mint. Between 1000 and 2000 light sovereigns are thus daily sent out of circulation. The silver is put up into bags, each of £1000 value, and the gold into bags of a thousand, and then these bullets of bullion are sent through a strongly guarded door, or rather window, into the treasury. The treasury is a gloomy apartment, fitted up with iron presses, which are supplied with huge locks and bolts, and which are perfectly fire-proof. Gold, silver, and copper money ready for circulation, to the amount of £22,000,000 sterling, were in the treasury when we visited it. One of the gentlemen in that department placed 1000 sovereigns in our hand, and, at the same time, pointed to seventy bags full of gold in the little recess which he had thrown open, making, in all, the smallest sum of £70,000. He placed notes to the amount of half a million also upon our palm, which, no doubt, had its own sensation as the precious deposit trembled on its top. The heads of departments meet in the treasury every evening, and there all the accounts are balanced.—Hogg's Instructor.

ON Christmas-day two flocks of wild geese were seen winging their course towards the Scottish border, a foreboding of severe weather, according to the opinion of our "oldest inhabitant;" the first, fifty in number, passed Whitehaven about eleven in the forenoon; the second, little short of 200, between three and four in the afternoon.—Cumberland Pacquet.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The French Legislative Assembly, having at last obtained some respite from domestic questions, has gladly taken up a subject belonging to the foreign relations of the Republic; and now that "order" is deemed to be sufficiently restored to admit of a little diplomatic folly being indulged in, the gentlemen who all fled shamefully and precipitately from the scene of danger when "confusion worse confounded" was the "order of the day," have, in the fancied security of established tranquillity, assumed quite a belligerent tone, in support of the visionary object of the maintenance of French influence in South America, on the banks of the Plata.

M. Larochejaquelin, M. Thiers, and several other leading politicians, deeming that the treaty concluded in the name of France by Admiral Le Predour with Rosas, the Dictator of Buenos Ayres, on the affairs of Monte Video is incompatible with the dignity of France, have seized the occasion of the bill granting a subsidy to the Monte-Videan Government, to force upon the French Government a measure requiring that any negotiations opened with Rosas for the modification of that treaty should be backed by a military expedition.

In the course of the discussion, General de la Hitte, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, announced the intentions of the Government on the subject of the question. He declared that the Government did not approve of the treaty signed by Admiral Le Prédour, and did not mean to ratify it; but he at the same time declared that it was not the intention of the Government to declare war against General Rosas—a war which, once commenced, might lead to interminable difficulties. Ten thousand men, at the very least, would be necessary, in his estimation, to establish the French firmly at Monte Video. Besides this waste of troops, it would be necessary to make arrangements for the provisions and other necessaries of the troops, which would have to be provided from abroad, as the whole of the country was in the hands of the enemy. This would be an enormous expense, and ought not to be incurred without due consideration. In his opinion, and in that of the Government, another attempt should be made to negotiate. Negotiations might produce results which would be less costly to the Treasury, and less compromising to their honour; whilst they might be equally advantageous to the interests of the country.

This speech was followed by that of Admiral Le Predour, the reporter of the committee to which the proposition for the credit, viz. 2,200,000 francs, had been referred), who strongly opposed the peace policy proposed by the Minister of War.

The debate has terminated (at least for the present) by the adoption of an amendment moved by M. de Rancé, allowing a credit of 10,000,000 francs to Government for the purpose of carrying on an energetic negotiation. This amendment was carried by a majority of 3; the numbers for it being 315, and against it 312. The effect of this vote will be to oblige the committee to make a fresh report, pointing out the particular kind of action to be pursued, and on which a new debate will arise. M. Thiers has prevented taking part in the debate by a bleeding of the mouth.

When the next division takes place, it is expected that the Ministers will have a majority, most of those who voted for M. Rancé's amendment having since changed their minds.

General Changarnier has had a handsome sword presented to him, which was raised by subscription, in acknowledgment of the services he has rendered to the Republic.

A few days since, a riot broke out among the first and second battalions of students at the Military School of La Fleche. The disturbance was soon put down, and the leaders arrested.

On New Year's Day, all political business was suspended in Paris, and the Bourse and other public offices closed. Great numbers of persons visited the various shops for the sale of bonbons, and the day was principally spent in family salutations. The receptions at the Elysée by the President of the Republic consisted of deputations from corporate bodies, the council of the University, the officers of the army and of the National Guards, &c., but no addresses were delivered.

The President celebrated the New Year by creating, for the first time since the revolution of February, a Field-Marshal of France. The General upon whom this distinguished honour has been conferred is the President's uncle, General Jérome Bonaparte, the Governor of the Invalides, and ex-King of Westphalia. The elevation of Jerome Bonaparte to the dignity of Marshal is considered a fact of some importance, as showing that there is a reconciliation between the President of the Republic and the members of his family.

The health of M. Jerome Bonaparte is improved, and he is expected to resume his seat in the Assembly in a few days.

On Monday the installation of the newly-elected judges and substitutes of the Tribunal of Commerce took place in the Salle des Pas Perdus, in the Palais de Justice, in presence of M. d'Argout, Governor of the Bank, and other commercial notabilities. In a speech delivered on the occasion by M. Devinck, the president, it was stated that the number of actions brought before the tribunal in the course of 1849, including those remaining over from the previous year, was 34,242; of which 21,864 were decided by default, 10,937 were tried, 853 were settled by conciliation, and the remainder had only entered the preliminary stage of proceeding, or were waiting the turn of being heard. 587 deeds of companies had been presented to the tribunal, being an increase of 210 on those of the preceding year, showing a remarkable improvement in business transactions. The amount of bankruptcies and judicial liquidations was 4,564,205f.; those of the preceding year, 194,717,970f. After deducting about 83,000,000f. paid in dividends, there remained 195,000,000f. as the amount of loss sustained by the trade of Paris for the two years, to which about 278,000,000f. for the bad debts of gérans, commanditaires, shareholders, &c., which do not figure in the return of liabilities—making a grand total loss of 873,000,000f.

ITALIAN STATES.

VENICE.—Accounts dated the 22nd ult. state, that Marshal Radetzsky, being satisfied with the peaceable demeanour of the inhabitants of the city, had issued an order, permitting them to leave their houses at any hour of the night for religious purposes or for amusement.

At Verona, on the 21st ult., the Austrian military commander, Lieutenant-General Wrbna, committed suicide.

The correspondent of the Daily News supplies the following details:—

Wrbna's appointment was one of those which were made in Italy recently by the Court without consulting Radetzsky. The old Marshal's dislike was all the more roused against the presumption of General Gruner in this instance, as Wrbna was the most unpopular as well as unsoldierlike officer in the army; and even, after repeated failures in the high positions assigned to him, this new favour of the Court purely to his aristocratic connexions and relationship to Schwarzenberg and Gruner. Wrbna was second in command over the army in Hungary under Windischgrätz, and headed the disastrous rout at Kapolna at the end of last March. He was then made commander of the city of Pesth. When Windischgrätz fell, the clamour against Wrbna, who was a near relative of the Prince Marshal, procured his removal for a time from active service. Meanwhile his brother, who enjoys a very near place about the Emperor as grand huntsman, advised another way to restore him to the current of promotion; and the reorganisation of the army gave Gruner the opportunity of appointing the military governor to the Austrian capital of Verona. Wrbna was even more disliked than he had been at Pesth, and the vexatious restrictions imposed upon the inhabitants together with the growing insolence of the garrison, bred frequent conflicts between the people and military; added hourly to the unpopularity of Wrbna, and at length brought matters to a crisis which he excesses; and we are at length succeeded by an ordinance increasing the rigour of the state of siege. Radetzky, who resolved "Italian affairs" during his absence, sent for Wrbna. He rated that officer soundly for his injudicious conduct, accused him of exceeding his powers, and ordered him to resign, threatening to have him tried by court-martial if he demurred. The Marshal continued his journey to Milan, and the same day the Governor of Verona was discovered in his room with his brains blown out.

PIEDMONT.—From Turin we learn that the Government has succeeded in inducing the Ministry to annul the election of M. Mamiani, the Liberal Roman, on the ground that he was not a naturalised Piedmontese. The election of M. Garibaldo, a State functionary, was also annulled, because he had demanded and obtained his discharge before the 9th, the day of his election, but had only received it later.

ROME.—General rumour reports the return of the Pope as near at hand, but adds that the people manifest no desire for the restoration of a loan. Count Gabriel Mastai, and the son of Louis Mastai had arrived at Rome. The Spanish troops which formed the garrison at Spoleto had left for Rieti.

AUSTRIA.

Advices from Vienna of the 26th ult. state that an amnesty was fully expected to be proclaimed on the first day of the new year.

His Majesty the Emperor grants private audiences three times a week. The number of petitions is sometimes 100, which the emperor answers individually. Once a week, very early in the morning, he gives a public audience, which is open to all his subjects, without exception. At these audiences his Majesty sometimes receives as many as 300 petitions.

The blessings of a "state of siege" were exhibited with a vengeance in Vienna on the night of the 27th ult., a student was passing before a sentinel with a cigar in his mouth, which the soldier ordered him to remove; the student refusing, and accompanying his non-compliance by some irritating expression, the ticket was discharged at him, and a ball lodged in the body. The wounded man is now lying in the hospital, but not expected to survive.

At Pesth, in Hungary, on the 26th ult., the new Austrian Constitution was solemnly proclaimed in the Senate House, in the presence of a large body of people.

Palacky, the leader of the Liberals in Bohemia, has just published, in the Nationality Zeitung, the chief organ of the party at Prague, a long manifesto against the centralization principles embodied in the octroyed constitution of March. The leader of the Czech party does not confine himself to marshalling all the arguments within his reach against Austrian centralization, but enters into a lucid statement of the principles of federalism, of which he is the known advocate.

BELGIUM.

The central section of the Chamber of Representatives has declared in favour of the retention of the present corn laws, with an increase on import duty. The section made a proposal against the abuse of the privilege now granted to public functionaries of free conveyance per railway.

UNITED STATES.

Accounts from New York to the 15th ult. mention that Congress had not then been organised. Some additional ineffectual ballotings for the election of a Speaker had taken place, in one of which, a locо-foco candidate, Mr. Brown, of Indiana, lost his election by one vote. Mr. Brown subsequently resigned. The Free-Soilers, upon whose vote to either side determines the voice of the Speaker, have determined on pursuing the course hitherto adopted by them, of not voting for a candidate unless he is pledged to their views; so that there is no conjecturing what time the house may be organised, or the message of President Taylor be delivered. The result, so far, has been only to bring a great amount of personal recrimination into the struggle, and ill-feeling is particularly exhibited between the northern and southern members.

In the case of the Boston tragedy, in which a coroner's inquest had been held, the jury have brought in a verdict of "Guilty of Murder" against Professor Webster.

CANADA.

In Canada, the reaction against annexation is showing decisive proofs of energy and determination. The magistrates, officers of militia, and Queen's counsel who signed the manifesto have been dismissed. It is said that a majority of the French inhabitants are opposed to the annexation movement. The influence of both religious and political Conservatism is decidedly directed against it. A new journal, to be called the North American, in favour of annexation, is about to appear in Toronto.

The troubles at the copper-mines of Lake Superior appear to have subsided. The steamer which was despatched from Toronto with additional troops has arrived in safety. M'Donald, the leader of the expedition, has been arrested, together with four of his prominent accomplices, and sent to Toronto for trial.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

PATRICK FRASER TYTLER.

THE Tytlers are a family of great antiquity; their proper name was Seton. Their ancestor, a cadet of the noble house of Seton, temp. James IV., having in a sudden quarrel slain a gentleman of the name of Gray at a hunting match, fled to France, and assumed the name of Tytler. His two sons returned to Scotland with Queen Mary, from the eldest of whom the present family descends. Their paternal arms, crest, and motto bear reference to these particulars. Patrick Fraser Tytler's grandfather, William Tytler, Esq., of Woodhouselee—so termed in Allan Ramsay's "Gentle Shepherd," an Enquiry historical and critical into the Evidence against Mary Queen of Scots," was father of Alexander Fraser Tytler, a Lord of Session under the title of Lord Woodhouselee, and a writer of celebrity. Lord Woodhouselee's "Life of Lord Kames," and his "Universal History," are standard works. He was an early and intimate friend of Sir Walter Scott. He married Anne Fraser, heiress of Balnain, who was a scion of the House of Lovat, and hence his additional surname of Fraser. Their third son, the subject of this notice, Patrick Fraser Tytler, was born in 1790. He was educated for the bar, and was enrolled a member of the Faculty of Advocates in 1813. While connected with this profession, he held the office of King's Counsel in Exchequer. He, however, soon abandoned the law for literature, to which he attached himself for the rest of his life with the most eminent success. His first work of note was the "Life of the Admirable Crichton." This was followed, some other productions intervening, by that undertaking which took nearly 14 years in its completion, and which will immortalize his name, the "History of Scotland." This work, which was published in nine volumes, recounts the Scottish annals, from the accession of David Bruce, in 1329, to the union of the two Crowns under James VI., in 1603. Mr. Tytler concluded his brilliant toil with the following touching peroration:—"It is with feelings of gratitude mingled with regret," said he, "that the author now closes this work—the history of his country—the labour of little less than eighteen years: gratitude to the Giver of all good, that life and health have been spared to complete, however imperfectly, an arduous undertaking; regret that the researches of historical investigation, the happy hours devoted to the pursuit of truth, are at an end, and that he must at last bid farewell to an old and dear companion." Mr. Tytler found leisure, in the midst of this great task, to write several other books among them, his delightful "Lives of the Scottish Worthies," and also the Lives of Sir Walter Raleigh and Henry VIII.; and many other works illustrative of history. A few years ago, Mr. Tytler received from the Crown a well-merited pension of £200 a year.

"Revered defender of the beauteous Stuart,"

Mr. Tytler was twice married. His first wife was a daughter of Mr. Hog, of Newliston. His second, who survives him, was the daughter of Mr. Bonar, a Scottish advocate. He leaves a large family. Mr. Tytler was always a person of delicate constitution. He had latterly wandered abroad in search of health, and had but recently returned from the Continent. He died at Great Malvern, in Worcestershire, on the 24th ultimo. His death is a loss not only to his family and friends, but to his country, whose history he could tell so well, and whose literature is so illumined by his writings.

LADY PYNN.

THIS unfortunate lady, whose recent and shocking death from being accidentally burnt alive in her sitting-room, occurred at Cheltenham, has caused such general grief, was the eldest daughter of the late Sir Richard Jackson, one of the leaders of the fashionable world at Cheltenham some twenty years ago. She was married to Sir Henry Pynn, C.B., a distinguished officer in the British service, and formerly Lieutenant-Governor of Valencia.

JOHN DUNCAN.

MR. DUNCAN, one of the most intrepid of English travellers in Africa, was the son of a small farmer in Wigtonshire, Scotland. At an early age he enlisted in the 1st regiment of Life Guards, in which he served with credit for 18 years, and discharged himself with a high character for good conduct, about the year 1840. In the spring of the following year, he started for the Niger, in the interest, and, during the progress of that ill-fated expedition, he held a conspicuous place in all the treaties made by the commissioners with the native chiefs. He returned to England, one of the remnants of the expedition, with a frightful wound in his leg, and a shattered body, from which he long suffered. With a return of health, however, came a renewed desire to explore Africa, and, under the auspices of the Geographical Society, he started in the summer of 1844, not without substantial proofs from many of the members of the interest they took in his perilous adventure. The particulars of his journey along the coast until his arrival in Dahomey were detailed in letters to his friends, and published in the Geographical Society's Journal of that period. From Dahomey he again returned to the coast, having traversed a portion of country hitherto untrodden by Europeans, but broken down in health, and in extreme suffering from the old wound in his leg. Fearful that mortification had commenced, he at one time made preparations for cutting off his own limb- a fact which displays the wonderfully great resolution of the man. All these journeys were undertaken on a very slenderly-furnished purse, which on his arrival at Wydah was nearly totally exhausted, but he was compelled to place himself in "pawn," as he expressed it, for advances which would take years of labour on the coast to liquidate. From that disagreeable position his friends of the Geographical Society relieved him by an ample subscription, with which he proposed to make a journey from Cape Coast to Timbuctoo, but the state of his health compelled him to return to England.

He was lately appointed Vice-Consul for Dahomey. He died on his way thither on the 3rd of last November, on board her Majesty's ship Kingfisher, in the Bight of Benin. Mr. Duncan leaves a wife, who is, we believe, but poorly provided for.

COLONEL IRVINE.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL Archibald Irvine, C.B., Director of the Engineering and Architectural Works of the Admiralty, was, during the greater part of his life, an arduous, gallant, and distinguished officer of the East India Company's Engineers. He served in many sieges and storms, being severely wounded, and on two occasions leading forlorn hopes. The talents of Colonel Irvine as a military engineer were highly prized by the late Sir Edward Codrington, by whom all his abilities were at the great battles under Lord Hardinge. Colonel Irvine, about three years ago, succeeded the late Colonel Brandreth, R.E., as chief of the Admiralty engineering and architectural department at Somerset House. Colonel Irvine died on the 29th ultimo, at his residence in Highgate. He leaves behind him a young and numerous family.

THE LATE MR. TYTLER.—As some misapprehension appears to exist on the subject, we are enabled to state that no pension will revert to the Government through the death of Mr. Tytler, the historian. By the last arrangement of the Civil List, the Government has no power to exceed the annual sum set apart for pensions, on account of the demise of any of the recipients on the list.

FINAL CLOSE OF THE PALACE COURT.—On Monday, at eleven o'clock, Mr. Brent took his seat on the bench for the last time, and the court was opened by the crier (Mr. Eley) in the usual manner. The attorneys attended, as well as the officers of the court, but the barristers of the court did not appear. The deputy prothonotary (Mr. Hewlett) inquired whether any person present had any business to transact in the Marshalsea or Palace Courts? No answer was given to the inquiry, and the deputy judged that the time for closing the courts. Mr. Eley went through the usual form of adjournment for the last time, and the court rose never to resume its sittings. As soon as Mr. Brent retired from the court, the six attorneys who were present presented their compliments to him, by Mr. Turner, the senior attorney, with a memorial expressive of their thanks for his kindness towards them whilst he had presided in that court. Mr. Brent expressed his thanks for the memorial, and, having taken leave of the attorneys, withdrew, and thus terminated the long-standing perversion of law and justice.

WRECK OF TWO ENGLISH VESSELS.—A letter from Fecamp of the 30th ult. announces the wreck on that coast of the English brig the Planet, of Jersey, and the Anne Lucy, of London. The crew of the Planet were saved; the fate of the crew of the Anne Lucy is not known.

ON Monday afternoon, an influential meeting of gentlemen who hold Protectionist principles took place at Thorpe-le-Soken, Essex, at which upwards of 400 tenant-farmers attended. Resolutions expressive of the determination of the meeting to use every available means for the re-establishment of protective duties were unanimously adopted.

MRS. Kerigan, widow of the late Thomas Kerigan, Esq., author of "Kerigan's Nautical Tables," elaborate and useful publication, "A New Theory," &c., has been nominated to one of the widows' houses and stipend at Penge, the admirable establishment founded, built, and endowed by the late Queen Adelaide.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE

The recurrence of New Year's Day has been marked by the customary munificence of her Majesty towards the poorer inhabitants of the Royal borough of Windsor and its vicinity. The distribution of her Majesty's gifts took place on Tuesday morning, in the riding-school, under the direction of the Rev. R. J. Gould and the Rev. S. Hawtrey. Her Majesty the Queen, with the Prince Consort and the Royal Family, his Royal Highness Prince George, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, the Hon. and Rev. Sacred Wellesley, Duncan Campbell, Esq., Chaplain to her Majesty, attending. The walls of the riding-school were tastefully decorated with evergreens, and the Royal gifts—consisting of meat, bread, potatoes, blankets, and clothing—were distributed to upwards of 3,000 persons, at desmask clothing. The recipients of the Royal bounty consisted of persons residing in the parishes of Windsor and Clewer, whose names were placed on a list by the ladies of the District Visiting Society, which list, after being carefully revised by the Rev. R. J. Gould and the Rev. Stephen Hawtrey, was forwarded to her Majesty. About 1800 yards of calico, nearly 900 yards of flannel, 75 pairs of blankets, upwards of 1100 lb. of beef, between 400 and 500 quartern loaves, besides a bountiful supply of plum-pudding, and a quantity of coals, were given away: the cost of the whole exceeding £250.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, her Royal Highness the Princess Mary, and his Serene Highness Prince Frederick of Hesse, arrived at the Castle on Tuesday evening, on a visit to her Majesty and the Prince Consort. His Royal Highness Prince George had joined the Royal circle on the previous day. On the same evening the Duchess of Kent dined with her Majesty and her illustrious relatives at the Castle.

On Wednesday morning, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince George, went out shooting. In attendance were Lord Elphinstone, Colonel Grey, Gen. C. B. Phipps, Colonel the Hon. Charles Grey, Colonel Berkeley Drummond, Lord Charles Fitzroy, Lieut.-Colonel Seymour, and Baron Knesebeck. Her Majesty took a drive in the afternoon, accompanied by her Royal visitors. In the first carriage were the Queen, the Prince Consort, His Royal Highness Prince George had joined the Royal circle on the previous day. The Countess Dowager of Mansfield and Lady Elizabeth Murray, the Commanding Officer of the Grenadier Guards (Colonel Thornton), and the Commanding Officer of the 1st Life Guards (Colonel Parker), had the honour of joining the Royal dinner-party in the evening.

The Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, with Prince George and the Princess Mary and Prince Frederick of Hesse, took leave of her Majesty and the Prince Consort on Thursday, and returned to Kew. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort on Thursday, and returned to Kew. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort afterwards took a drive in Windsor Park, attended by the Marchioness of Douro. In the evening the Duke and Duchess de Nemours arrived at the Castle, on a visit to her Majesty and the Prince Consort. The Duchess of Kent joined the Royal dinner circle on Thursday evening.

Lord Charles Fitzroy relieved Lord Alfred Paget (Clerk Marshal) in the duties of Equerry in Waiting to the Queen; and Lieutenant-Colonel Francis Hugh Seymour has relieved Colonel Bouverie in the duties of Equerry in Waiting to his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

The Queen will hold a Privy Council on Tuesday next, at Windsor Castle. Summonses were issued on Monday to the Ministers and Officers of State.

Her Serene Highness the Duchess of Saxe-Weimar, with their Serene Highnesses the Princesses Anne and Amelia, and Prince Gustave, of Saxe-Weimar, left Marlborough House soon after eight o'clock on Monday morning, and travelled by the South Eastern Railway to Dover, en route to the Continent. His Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar accompanied, and Captain Bedford attended, the Duchess of Saxe-Weimar, until her Serene Highness landed on the Continent, and have since returned to town.

His Excellency the Brazilian Minister arrived in town yesterday from the Continent.

Lord John Russell left Richmond on Wednesday, for Woburn Abbey.

A matrimonial alliance will shortly be celebrated between Mr. John Harford Battersby, eldest son of Mr. A. Harford Battersby, of Stoke Park, Somerset, and Mademoiselle Maria Bunsen, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of his Excellency the Prussian Minister at this court.

The Marchioness of Normanby arrived in Hill-street, on Saturday, from the British Embassy, Paris.

The Earl and Countess Granville left town on Monday, for Paris.

The Countess Ferrers gave birth to a daughter on Christmas-Day. Her Ladyship and the infant are progressing favourably.

We regret to learn that a distressing accident occurred to Lord Sesham, while shooting in the preserves at Wynyard Park, on the 31st ult. A rebound of single small shot from a tree struck his Lordship's left eye, and great fears are entertained that the sight will be affected.

Lord Ward has arrived at Berlin.

A congratulatory address to Lord Burghley, on the birth of a son and heir, has been presented to his Lordship by the Mayor and corporation of Stamford.

The statements respecting the resignation of his high office by Lord Denman are entirely erroneous. He has not tendered his resignation, consequently the question of its acceptance by the Government—"most frequently or otherwise—has not arisen. The last accounts received by his family announce a marked improvement in his Lordship's health.

LORD BROUGHAM.—A letter, dated Cannes, of the 19th ult., in the Monsieur du Soir, says:—"Lord Brougham has been making some interesting experiments on light here, which are just terminated. At eleven o'clock at night, on the 14th, four members of the Royal Society of London gave to the population a nothing spectacle: at the top of the towers of the noble Lord the apparatus of the electrical light was placed, and at the same instant a luminous point shone from the Ile Sainte Marguerite, and its brilliant rays displayed to all eyes the beauty of the enchanting site. The same rays were afterwards directed on the magnificent scenery of the Cap-Roux, and on the picturesque roadstead of Agal. The coup d'œil at such an hour was so beautiful, that explosions suddenly broke forth from all parts. The next day, Lord Brougham, in the midst of a numerous and chosen circle, gave a detailed and very interesting account of his experiments on light."

AGRICULTURAL SCIENCE IN RUSSIA.—The year 1848 having been remarkable throughout all Southern Russia for its extreme drought, which caused a great scarcity of corn, forage, and other agricultural produce, and compelled many proprietors of merino sheep to kill their flocks to prevent their dying of hunger, the Imperial Economical Society has appropriated the sum of twelve hundred roubles (400*l*.), to be given in gold or silver medals to those who shall publish the best work on a means of preserving forage without deterioration, pointing out the most adapted for each province, and also as to the best kinds of grain which can be sown to withstand the influence of the great droughts which are so common in that country.

SOUTH SEA COMPANY.—The half-yearly meeting of this company was held at the South Sea House, on Thursday, the Governor, Mr. C. Franks, in the chair, when an account was read, from which it appeared that the income of the company for the last half-year amounted to £1,[illegible], the expenditure of the same period to £[illegible], leaving a balance of £[illegible], which would enable the proprietors to declare a dividend of 1*l*. £64,689 3*s*. 1*d*., which would enable the proprietors to declare a dividend of 1*l*. per cent. on their stock, and carry forward a balance of £[illegible]. The dividend was declared, and thanks having been given to the chairman, the meeting separated.

THE NAVIGATION LAWS.—On Tuesday last the new navigation laws came into force. The act of last session (12 & 13 Vict. c. 29) has repealed statutes and parts of statutes from the 37 Geo. 3 to the 8 & 9 Vict. The substance of the act itself may be briefly stated. The coasting trade is to be confined to British vessels, and British seamen are to be employed. Regarding reciprocity with other nations, her Majesty in Council may issue orders to impose additional duties on foreign ships when our goods are not admitted, as may appear to her Majesty to commercially the disadvantages to which British trade or navigation is subjected by prohibitions and restrictions of other nations. The orders are to be published in the London Gazette, and to specify the vessels to which they apply. A new form of certificate of registry is prescribed, and other regulations made, as also a declaration to be made by the owners before vessels are registered. It is enacted that if any goods be imported, exported, or carried coastwise contrary to this act, all such goods shall be forfeited, and the master of the ship in which the same are so imported, exported, or carried coastwise, shall forfeit the sum of £100, except where any other penalty is specially imposed by the act.

THE NEW COFFEE DUTIES.—By the Customs Act of the last session, entitled, "An Act to amend the Laws relating to the Customs" (12 and 13 Vict., chap. 90), the new duties on coffee came into operation on Tuesday last. It is enacted, that, on and after the 1st day of January, 1850, the duties on coffee, kiln-dried, roasted, or ground, the growth, &c., of and from foreign countries, 8*d*.; of and from British possessions, 5*d*. The 30th section of the act says that goods in the bonded warehouse at the commencement of these duties shall be dee ed to be subject to them; therefore, all coffee, kiln dried, roasted, or ground, which is now in warehouse, is equally with such as shall be imported, on and after the 1st January, will be entitled to admission for home use at the duties mentioned. The duties on coffee are not an alteration or reduction of the previous existing duties on coffee, which are and will remain 6*d*. and 4*d*. the pound respectively, but are new rates of duties imposed on the article in a kiln dried, roasted, or ground state. We believe we are correct in stating that they are entirely new rates of duty, no such rates of duty having been provided for in any previous table of duties.

THE MORALITY OF LOVE.—We may here remark, by way of parenthesis, that not win exhibit the highest sense of honour in other affairs, sometimes commit the most flagrant breaches of trust in the affairs of love. They will sacrifice a friend in such cases with as little remorse as if the whole thing were a jest at a masquerade. Strange that women, to whom we ascribe the most refining and elevating influences, should ruin our morals in this way! Alas! alas! there is no morality in love!—"The Ladder of Gold," in Bentley's Miscellany.

HULSEAN PRIZE.—This prize, left for the best dissertation in the English language, on the evidences in general, or on the prophecies or miracles in particular, has been adjudged to Samuel Tobin, of Trinity College, for his Subject.—"The influence of the Jewish and Christian Revelations on Pagan Writings."

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, STRATFORD.—At the offertory on Christmas-Day, a chalice was presented by some members of the congregation It was laid upon the altar amongst the usual "alms and oblations," but was not consecrated or used in the celebration of the holy sacrament on the occasion, as it is intended to substitute one of larger dimensions, which could not be procured for the above festival. The design of the cup, the gift of other gifts, is from Mr. Butterfield, as represented in his "Instrumenta Ecclesiastica." Round the base are interchanged the monograms of "I. H. Σ." and "X. P. Δ." The chalice is enriched by the following inscription:—"Sobolem de spiritu frequenter eos petrà, petra autem erat Christus" (they drank of the spiritual rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ).

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH BETWEEN FRANCE AND ENGLAND.—The concession signed by Louis Napoleon and the Minister of the Interior, M. Dufaure, granting to Messrs. J. Brett, Tochè, and Co. the right to establish an electric telegraph line between France and England for the exclusive communication across the Channel, arrived in town on Monday. The company propose to establish, by means of the electric telegraph, an instant communication between the two countries. The patentee guarantees that this telegraph shall, by the aid of a single wire and of two persons only (the one stationed in France, and the other in England), be capable of printing, in clear roman type (on paper), 100 messages, of fifteen words each, including addresses and signatures, all ready for delivery in one hundred consecutive minutes.

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES IN AMERICA.—The steamer Hermann, which arrived at New York on Saturday, the 16th ult., from Bremen and Southampton, brought a number of distinguished Hungarians as passengers, who propose to take up their residence in the United States. Among them were, the late Governor of Comorn, Ladislaus Ujvary, his wife and four children, and Mdlle Apolonia Jagello, the sister-in-law of Kossuth. The party were received as the guests of the Astor House and the Irving House, where a cordial welcome was extended to them, in honour of their eminent service, their character, and their misfortunes. Mdlle. Jagello was frequently the correspondent of Kossuth during his captivity and adoration on the following Sunday, by the courteous proprietor of the Irving House, and his numerous guests. A simple homage was tendered to her at the public table, which was ornamented with wreaths of flowers, a combination of her history: the whole company of ladies and gentlemen rose to do her honour, and, in a few words of heartfelt recognition and greeting, she was welcomed to the freedom of the country and the hospitality of its people. During the evening the drawing-rooms of the Irving House were thronged with visitors eager to pay their respects to the heroic maid. The committee for the aid of Hungarian exiles, of which the Mayor of New York is the treasurer, is now in active operation. They will be assisted, to surround them with the distinctions which they have so nobly won. Among the passengers by the Hermann was also Mr. A. Ruge, a distinguished leader of the democratic party in Germany, and an able writer on political philosophy. The steamer Europa, which arrived at Boston on the 9th ult., brought as passengers two Hungarian patriots, Colonel Pragay and Major Forest. As soon as their arrival was known, they were waited on by a deputation on behalf of the Boston Committee for the aid of Hungarian refugees to the country. They have since arrived in New York, and are universally treated with the most affectionate sympathy.

MERCANTILE AND MISCELLANEOUS CORRESPONDENCE OF THE NEW AND OLD WORLD.—The number of letters which passes through the New York Post-office in a single day, and by a single mail, is an interesting fact. It is still more interesting to compare the amount of correspondence between New York and Europe, with a portion of this continent twice as distant as the O.d World. The following are the statistics of letters despatched from the New York Post-office on Wednesday and Thursday:—

Per Canada on the 15th, to Europe	.. .. ..	32,000
Per Ohio on the 15th, to California, &c. ..	.. ..	13,300
Per Crescent City	.. ..	1,000
Per Cherokee	.. ..	900
Per Great Western, to Bermuda ..	.. ..	700
Total	.. ..	48,400

Here we have the enormous number of nearly 50,000 letters dispatched in two days, by mail steamers, from this city, and if we added the Canada and Boston closed mails, which also passed through the New York Post-Office, the numbers would probably amount to 65,000. This is independent of newspapers and inland correspondence with the Ohio carried out: 15,000 newspapers, and the Cherokee 1000. It is a singular fact that the correspondence to California is nearly half as great as that to the whole of Europe, with all its ancient and glorious cities and commercial marts. Does not this fact speak volumes for the giant strides to prosperity of the new state of California, which has sprung up in the Far West, as if from the touch of a magic cane's wand? The letters by the three steamers on Thursday numbered 15,700, and the newspapers 15,000. Let us calculate the revenue upon these, the average being equal, for the California letters as single:—

Letters, at 40*c.* each	24,000
Papers, at 2*c.* each	6280
	480
Letters to Europe, averaging 1½ rate, or 30*c.* each	23,550
Total sea postage	—16,360

This is a pretty large revenue for two days, for letters dispatched by mail steamers alone.—New York Herald.

SHIPWRECKS.—The recent mail from the United States brought tidings of the loss of another emigrant ship from Liverpool. The unfortunate vessel was the Sailor Prince, Captain M'Kachner, master, bound to New Orleans, and at the time had upwards of four hundred persons on board, of whom three hundred and seventy-six were emigrants, men, women, and their children, the chief of whom were from the midland counties. The wreck took place on the night of the 1st of November, on a reef of rocks near the island of Cancum. The weather is reported to have been of the most fearful description, and the ship on the rocks in a few hours she became a perfect wreck. The crew, who acted with great humanity, contrived to land the whole of the emigrants on the island in safety, but there their sufferings became frightful. Little or no provisions were got out of the wreck; and an intense fruit setting in played such havoc among the unfortunate creatures, that within twenty-four hours no fewer than thirteen had perished. The ship was 700 tons burthen, and was insured to the amount of £9800.—The loss of the packet-ship Agnes has been made known at Lloyd's. She was bound to Bremen from New York, with a general cargo and fifty passengers. Off the coast of Texel she encountered heavy gales, which drove her ashore on that coast. Only seven of the passengers saved their lives, as also twelve of the crew. The remainder all met with a watery grave.

IRELAND.

HIGH RENTS, PROTECTION, AND THE POOR-LAW.—A vast out-door meeting was held last week at Templemore, in the county of Kerry, which was important, as being the most distinct expression of the feelings of the Irish tenant-farmer class on the question of Protection yet given utterance to. The chair was occupied by T. O'Sullivan, Esq., of Prospect Lodge, and the following were among the resolutions adopted:—

That it is the opinion of this meeting that the free importation of corn into this union is essentially necessary—not only for its well-being and prosperity, but for its actual existence; and that any attempt to re-impose a duty on the importation of food can only have the effect of—we, by the prices and increasing the rentals of a few landlords, whilst it must, of necessity, add to the sufferings of the people.

That we do not by any means accuse or participate in the cry that is being raised against the present Poor-law, inasmuch that, with all its defects, it has conferred a great boon on the poor of the country, in that sick and who ought to bear it. It is, to a certain extent, relieves the struggling farmer: for heavy burden he had hitherto, solely and unaided by the landlord, to bear, viz. the support of the poor; and it leaves no choice to the landlord between supporting the poor in his and unprofitably in the workhouse, and their useful and remunerative end, by employment in the cultivation of the soil and otherwise.

That the rents of this union have been at all times tremendous, and of late years so oppressive as to render it impossible to hold out any longer under so grievous a burden. All our means have gone out for the import of food during four successive famines, our farming produce has fallen to half its value, taxation has been doubled, and yet the same rents, with the exceptions, have been demanded and paid with as much severity as they have been in the times the most prosperous and flourishing. Seeing, therefore, no disposition on the part of the landlords to make a reduction in accordance with the times, we have no alternative but to declare that we will not pay the present rents, and, once for all, to state upon what principle we are willing to pay them. That only another evidence of the impropriety of establishing such a law for a people in such a condition.

I crossed the Bay to Galway, and proceeded towards Clifden by a route devoid of interest, exhibiting, in a less degree than in Clare, the usual signs of devastation in progress. Mr. Martin's property extends almost the whole way from Ouchterade to Clifden, and is a mixture of mountain, moor, and fertile land, capable of indefinite improvement, with great facility of water carriage, but most sadly neglected. It is a bad sign for the next harvest, and for the people of this country, that in my whole journey from Galway I did not see more than from thirty to forty persons, including all ages and sexes; and, with the exception of ten men working under a road contractor, few or none of them were at work.

At Carthaken the levellers have been at work, and tumbled down eighteen houses. In one of them dwelt John Killian, who stood by me while I made the accompanying Sketch of the remains of his dwelling. He told me that he and his fathers before him had owned this now ruined cabin for ages, and that he had paid £4 a year for four acres of ground. He owed no rent: before it was due, the landlord's drivers cut down his crops, carried them off, gave him no account of the proceeds, and then tumbled his house. The hut made against the end wall of a former habitation was not likely to remain, as a decree had gone forth entirely to clear the place. The old man also told me that his son having cut down, on the spot that was once his own garden, a few sticks to make him a shelter, was taken up, prosecuted, and sentenced to two months' confinement for destroying trees and making waste of the property.

I must supply you with another Sketch of a similar subject on the road between Maam and Clifden, in Joyce's County once famous for the Patagonian stature of the inhabitants, who are now starved down to ordinary dimensions. High up on the mountain, but on the road-side, stands the scalpeen of Keillines. It is near General Thompson's property. Conceive five human beings living in such a hole: the father was out, at work; the mother was getting fuel on the hills, and the children left in the hut could only say they were hungry. Their appearance confirmed their words—want was deeply engraved in their faces, and their lank bodies were almost unprotected by clothing.

At Kylemore my companion bought a turbot, weighing from 18lb. to 20lb., for 1s. 6d., and might have had it for 1s. had he driven a hard bargain. The fact indicates that the sea would supply plenty of food if man would take the trouble to procure it. A similar proof of the equal capacity of the soil is found at a short distance from Kylemore. Two enterprising Englishmen, of the name of Eastwood, planted themselves there about four years ago, and all around them the bleak and barren moor has been changed into well laid-out fields—some green with herbage, and others brown and dingy with the stubble of the carried corn. There is a comfortable lodge, in the Elizabethan style, and around it suitable farm buildings. The whole indicates skill, industry, and good taste; it indicates, too, great courage in overcoming a moral as well as a physical opposition. The Messrs. Eastwood have, in some measure, conquered the habits of the people, which was a more difficult task than subduing the neglected and deserted heath. They will be pioneers to others, who will select, let us hope, this fertile and promising wilderness for the scene of their exertions, instead of wrestling against the arid sands of Australasia, or engaging in competition for the plains of the Mississippi with emigrants from all the countries of Europe. Their example has in fact been followed; and between their abode and Clifden two or three beginnings have been made—so that the country adjoining that town exhibits several signs of improvement.

This neighbourhood, before the potato rot came, was not so entirely occupied by the cultivation of the root as some other parts of the country. In the Union of Kilrush, for example, in 1848, there were 11,569 acres under potatoes, out of an area of 178,935 acres; in the Union of Clifden there were only 3714 acres, out of anares of 183,504 acres, under potatoes. The fact is of some importance, in explaining the comparative ease with which the poor in Clifden have been disposed of. Clifden itself is an exotic in an unfavourable climate. It was reared by the patronage of the late Viscount; and since that ceased, it began to decline: the Poor-law has almost finished it. Before we reached, we learned that the guardians of the union were out of money, and obliged to pay for what they wanted by cheques, which they are to receive in payment of the rates. Extreme poverty exists in the neighbourhood—the soil around is poor—great numbers of houses have been levelled—but the poor, unlike those of Kilrush, have in great part disappeared with the houses. They have not found refuge in the workhouse—they have not been carried away as emigrants; they have either wandered away or have died, or both may have contributed to cause their disappearance. I have a list of 111 houses levelled within a few months in the immediate neighbourhood of Clifden, which is very considerable, considering that the whole population of the Union was only 33,465 in 1841. Assuming five inmates to a house, the sixtieth part of the population has been dispossessed. Here, too, there is little more than one person to every six acres; or, nearly as is the population of Clare, the population of the Union of Clifden is not, in relation to acres, half so abundant. I have taken a Sketch of the workhouse, which I send as a memorial of this pet place of the late Viscount Clifden.

THE WORKHOUSE, CLIFDEN.

From Clifden to Ouchterade, twenty-one miles, is a dreary drive over a moor, unrelieved except by a glimpse of Mr. Martin's house at Ballynahinch, and of the residence of Dean Mahon. Destitute as this tract is of inhabitants, about Ouchterade some thirty houses have been recently demolished. A gentleman who witnessed the scene told me nothing could exceed the heartlessness of the levellers, if it were not the patient submission of the sufferers. They wept, indeed; and the children screamed with agony at seeing their homes destroyed and their parents in tears; but the latter allowed themselves unresistingly to be deprived of what is to most people the dearest thing on earth next to their lives—their only home.

I returned to Galway, where the Poor-law officials are not communicative, nor is there in the Union any extraordinary fact to communicate. The old town is a jumble of thatched mud cabins, stone-built houses, and the remains of a former splendour, old sculptures and carvings, putting to shame the homely and even rude houses of a modern date. The people are remarkable for the vivid colours of their dresses, amongst which red predominates, and some lingering traces of a foreign origin may yet be discovered in their countenances. Here, as in most other sea-ports and fishing towns, particularly of Ireland, hulking men lounging about were numerous, and appeared to have every other capacity to work but the will. You are not annoyed, however, by mendicants in Galway, as in other Irish towns, though there is a universal complaint of distress flushed by the exclamation, "That last five-shilling rate is a death-blow to all."

From Galway I proceeded to Ennis, and in the neighbourhood inspected the village of Clear, which had been destroyed within a few weeks, and some part of it within a few days. The Sketch of Pat Macnamara's Cabin shews the condition of the village. In Ennis I went through the lanes and alleys, and amongst the most distressed part of the population. In one small room, not 70 feet square, I found congregated fifteen people, young and old, exhibiting nearly all the phases of want and squalor. From the smoke which filled the place, it was a Rembrandt scene, and it was with difficulty I could make out the forms of the wretched groups, or of the squalid and dying child on the floor. In the union workhouse of Ennis there is order, decency, and regularity. With it is conjoined a farm of eighteen acres, which is well cultivated by the labour of the paupers. It is wisely placed under the superintendence of one of Lord Clarendon's practical agricultural instructors; and probably he is as well employed in displaying his skill at the farm as in any other mode of teaching his art.

At Ennis, I consider my tour terminated; and I shall only send you further some general observations on the Poor-law, and some suggestions as to what might reasonably be done for Ireland.

CATTLE MUSTERING IN AUSTRALIA.

CATTLE MUSTERING IN AUSTRALIA.

A CATTLE MUSTER in Australia is a proceeding so peculiarly different from anything ever seen in this country, that a slight description of it will doubtless be interesting. The object of a Cattle Muster is, as its name denotes, the collecting together of all the cattle belonging to the settler upon whose run, or grazing territory, it takes place; and this, in order either to brand the calves or to draft out some particular description of cattle bullocks for the knife, perhaps, or young heifers to be sent to the heifer station.

When a muster is meditated, notice is given to the adjoining cattle-holders, so that not only you may have the benefit of their assistance, but that they may drive off any of their stock which may have found its way on to your run.

From the extreme distances between the stations, the volunteers generally make their appearance at the appointed station on the night before; and then great is the scramble for beds, both in your own hut and in the men's, as the kitchen is usually called: some have, with prudent forethought, brought a blanket or opossum rug, and with pea-coats, &c., a "shake-down" is at last found for all.

At peep-of-day, all are on the move, and instructions are given during breakfast as to the different routes which are to be pursued by your assistants: one is to go by the deep gully, and come home by the Black-fellows' Creek; another is to take the Kangaroo Creek, and call at the Sandy Camp coming in; a third goes by the Snakey Creek to the Native Dog-hole, and home by the Round Camp; and so on until all the force has been expended. They generally go two together: their aim is to get to the outside of all the cattle belonging to the run, and on their way towards the Main Camp, or general rendezvous, to collect and bring in all they can find; this they do by keeping a sharp look-out for fresh tracks, and by taking particular notice of the small camps on which they have left mobs of cattle on their way out, so that they may pick them up in returning. On their way towards the Main Camp, their charge gradually increases, as they pass each out camp, until, as they approach the water-hole, or creek, beside which the Main Camp stands, they may have many hundreds bellowing before them. The noise of a couple of thousand head of bush cattle, trumpeting forth a salute to each fresh mob that appears, blended with the cracks of the sonorous stock-whip, the yelping of curs, and the hooting and bellowing of stockmen, is tremendous

The words mob of cattle, and main or out camps, have occurred several times and may need some explanation. The first is applied to any collection of cattle, from five to five hundred. The latter word, camp, is not so self-explaining. To give a clear definition of it, I must suppose you to have arrived on a new run with your cattle. On the first night you may generally let them please themselves; they will be too tired to stray farther than you can with ease follow and bring them back in the morning; but, next night, collect them at sun-down, and drive them to the side of some creek or water-hole (as in the Engraving), where you keep them until, finding some comfortable dry place, they lie down for the night. This you continue for, perhaps, three months, and this forms the main camp in future years, to which the herd naturally head on being disturbed. The out camps are formed by chance, from the partiality of cattle for congregating round any dead body. A dead calf or kangaroo may form the nucleus of one, whilst others may be formed by the side of a water-hole, in which water is more generally found than in other parts of the run.

Bulls are seldom at all savage, or even wild, and, in company with the latest dropped calves, bring up the rear of the mob. In fact, it often requires a vigorous application of the stock-whip to induce them to go to the camp at all. The stock-whip has been often described, so that I need only picture it as a gigantic hunting-whip, of which the thong is from fifteen to twenty feet long, and about an inch and a quarter in diameter at the thickest portion of the belly. The handle is only about fifteen inches long; and yet, with this seeming disproportion, an adept can use it with more ease than the generality of people could a hunting-whip.

Cutting-out or drawing off the strange cattle, yarding the whole mob, drafting, cutting, and branding, and finally counting out, concludes the affair; but these are worthy of a separate description. A PORT-PHILIP SETTLER.

CALIFORNIA.

WE have been favoured with the following letter and illustrative Sketch, by Mr. Alexander Millie, of the firm of Millie and Co., agents for Messrs. H. J. and D. Nicoll (of London), for California and the neighbouring parts of the coast of the Pacific:—

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, Oct. 25, 1849.

We arrived here on the 10th of this month, without either of us having had a day's illness. I wrote you from Valparaiso. Our passage from thence has been rather tedious—seventy-five days. We have taken a room here with two of our fellow-passengers (Scotchmen), for which we pay fifty dollars a month (£10). We can live pretty cheaply, and are saving money. Rents are very high indeed: in a good part of the town, £35 a month rent is asked for a piece of ground twenty-three feet by forty feet deep, payment to be made two months cash, and the remainder monthly, or at the rate of 32s. a foot frontage per month. The rent of a shop of this size is 400 dollars a month. Building materials and labour are very high. Iron houses bring ten times what they cost in England. The duty on all articles is 30 per cent.: there is no tariff to be got here, but it can, I believe, be easily got in London. Invoices certified by the American Consul are requested to be sent along with all goods.

There are about 10,000 or 15,000 inhabitants in San Francisco. A great deal of building is going on; the houses are mostly of wood, and tents are to be seen in all directions. Everything in the shape of property is perfectly secure both here and at the mines. There are no outrages heard of. Gold is worth here sixteen dollars an ounce; I believe seventeen dollars and a half can be got for it with you. Wages here are sometimes paid in gold dust, and at the rate of sixteen dollars an ounce.

Many are going and returning from the mines: some are fortunate and others are not, according as they hit upon a good or bad spot; but every one can, at least, make an ounce a day. Everything there is very dear.

We learn from a New York paper, that, upon the occasion of fixing upon the starting-point of the southern boundary of California by the joint commission of the United States and Mexico, the American Commissioners (including Colonel Weller) rode down from San Diego to the "Punts" to meet the Mexican Commissioners, for the purpose of settling upon a boundary line. Having met, they rode to the southernmost point on the bay of San Diego, and then to the other end of the Marine League. After a few minutes' consultation, the point was decided upon, and they returned to Mr. Gray's camp at the Punts. Having partaken of a cold collation, they started for San Diego, thirteen miles distant, and arrived there the same night. The starting-point of the boundary line thus determined on is on the extremity of the table land, as you approach the bay, and is the first land you make in a steamer approaching San Diego from the south. It may be marked by a lighthouse some future day. On the 10th of October, the Commissioners again met, and jointly signed a paper, written in Spanish and English, to the effect that this was the point determined upon by the joint Commissioners of the American and Mexican Governments, under the treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo, as the starting-point on the Pacific for the boundary between the two Republics. This paper was enclosed in a glass bottle, and placed in a hole in the earth, three feet in depth. Some shovelsfull of earth were then thrown upon the bottle by Colonel Weller on behalf of the American Government, and General Conde on behalf of the Mexican Government. An upright post was then planted in the hole to mark the spot. During these ceremonies the countenances of the Mexican Commissioners exhibited a remarkable degree of gravity: they did not forget that they were affixing the last seal to the treaty for the dismemberment of their Republic.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1850.

THE steady revival of trade during the year that has just passed away, marks it, with many other circumstances, as the first year of returning prosperity, after a long and dismal period of adversity. In almost every branch of our export trade, the revival is conspicuous. A tabular statement of our exports from the ports of London, Liverpool, Bristol, Hull, and Glasgow, during the years 1848 and 1849, has just been published under the authority of the Board of Trade, which places the gratifying fact in a very clear and unmistakeable light. The largest increase of our trade in the two years has been with the great markets of the United States and India. In the year 1848, we exported to the United States 1,477,429 lb. of cotton thread; in 1849, the export of the same article rose to 2,047,250 lb. In 1848, we exported to the same country 18,772,096 yar.ls of plain calicoes; but in 1849, the export of the same fabric was only 18,701,719 yards. Of printed and dyed calicoes, the export, in 1848, was 45,656,113 yards; in 1849, it was 53,653,653 yards. Of linen and cotton goods, mixed, the export for 1848 was 1,258,078 lb., whilst for 1849 it was 3,895,509 lb. Of linen, the export of 1848 was 23,847,989 yards, and of 1849 no less than 30,912,303 yards. With India, the increase in these and other items was still more gratifying and remarkable. The cotton yarn exported in 1848 to our Eastern possessions amounted to 14,363,658 lb. This amount was nearly doubled in 1849, when the export rose to 28,150,141 lb. There was a slight decrease in the export of thread, but every other item shows a large increase. The export of plain calicoes, which in 1848 was 142,079,346 yards, rose in 1849 to 233,925,594 yards. Printed calicoes rose from 19,932,524 yards to 32,416,851 yards; and lace, gauze, net, and crapes rose from 998,004 yards to 2,039,612 yards. The total result, on a comparison of the two years with all the markets of the world, stands thus:—

The plethora of gold in the coffers of the Bank of England sufficiently proves that this increased trade has been a remunerative one. The figures speak for themselves, and appeal earnestly to the consciences of Mr. Disraeli and the other leaders of the party who are continually croaking of the ruin wrought by the operation of Free-Trade.

THE hungry officials in France (their name is Legion) who are interested in the continuance of the passport nuisance have been doing their utmost, for some time past, to bully or persuade travellers into the belief that the old system has not been superseded. It appears, however, that, as regards the communication between England and France, the passport system has been finally abolished, and that any official demanding a passport is guilty of an impertinence, and that any one demanding a fee is guilty of an attempt at extortion. Nor is this the sole benefit which the enterprise of railway directors on both sides of the Channel, aided by the common-sense and kind feeling of the present French Government, has conferred upon the English public. By means of arrangements just completed between the South-Eastern Railway Company and the directors of the two great French lines (the Boulogne and Amiens, and the Northern of France), which came into operation on the 1st of January, 1850, travellers may obtain "through tickets" from London to Paris, Brussels, Malines, Aix-la-Chapelle, or Cologne, without being subjected to any annoyance in the shape of examination of baggage, &c., from the time of leaving London-bridge until they arrive at their destination.

Thus have the two greatest impediments in the way of comfortable travelling been removed—the examination of luggage and the detention at the passport-office. Railways, after all, are the great peace-makers. They practically, by minimizing distance and time, bring the nations of the world into friendly contact with one another, soften animosities, extend trade, and show that, although language, manners, and forms of Government may differ, the interest of all nations is the same.

Lay down your rails, ye nations, near and far—
Yoke your full trains to Steam's triumphal car;
Link town to town—unite in iron bands
The long estranged and oft-remoted lands.
Peace, mild-eyed seraph—Knowledge, light divine—
Shall send their messengers by every line.

CONDITION OF IRELAND.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

St. Paul's, Dec. 31, 1849.

SIR,—I beg to offer you my sincere thanks for your truthful and admirably illustrated notice of the present condition of the poor of the Kilrush Union; in which, as an eye-witness of many of the horrors which you have so feelingly described, and also as a near relative of Captain Kennedy, I take the deepest interest.

You will, I am sure, rejoice to learn, that, since the publication of your paper of December 22nd, contributions already exceeding three hundred pounds have been sent to Captain Kennedy, in aid of the cause in which he is so zealously, but, without some such assistance, so hopelessly engaged. Many persons have, consequently, been desirous to write to him to ascertain how their intended contributions can be forwarded, will you oblige me by stating in your next paper that Post-office orders to the credit of Captain Arthur Edward Kennedy, Kilrush, county Clare, Ireland, will be thankfully received, in aid of Captain Kennedy's clothing fund? I should also, myself, be most willing to furnish any information, by letter or personal communication, of any receive subscriptions, and forward them to their destination, being in almost daily communication with Captain Kennedy.

I am, sir, yours obediently,

HERBERT KYNASTON, D.D.,
High Master of St. Paul's School.

P.S.—Some benevolent ladies having proposed to send clothing, it is respectfully suggested, that the delay and great expense of carriage render such a mode of relief less desirable than contributions in money.

CHRISTMAS CAROLS.—It was observed during the past Christmas that the noisy waits were few and far between in the streets of the metropolis. A happy change it was to the in-dwellers of St. Marylebone to hear, this Christmas, a well-appointed vocal company, singing really impressive strains, and in a musician-like, as well as reverential, manner; as in the choral shout, and a solemn one, too, raised in the dead silence of the winter night, "Adeste fideles, lets triumphantly!" The performers were recognised as the choir of one of the neighbouring churches; and, if any security was required for the decorous conduct of the whole, it was to be found in the fact that they were headed by their clergyman, incorporated.

VISIT OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION TO ICELAND.—Dr. Daubeney, Professor of Chemistry at Oxford, states in the Guardian, that a steamer is to start from Leith about two months before the next meeting of the British Association, for the purpose of carrying out a selected party, to explore the geology of Iceland. It is arranged that the voyagers shall return in time to communicate the result of their observations and discoveries to the congress in Edinburgh.

GENERAL GUYON.—On Wednesday evening, a numerous body of friends met at the Brown Bear Inn, Richmond, Surrey, to celebrate the distinguished performances of General Guyon during the late Hungarian war—the above-named eminent officer being a native of Richmond. The chair was filled by Mr. Wilson, to whom General Guyon is particularly known; and it is scarcely possible to describe the enthusiastic manner in which the name of our countryman was received. Throughout the whole proceedings of the evening but one spirit—sympathy for the cause of the Hungarians—was expressed.

SIR JOHN BARROW'S MONUMENT.—The site originally suggested as being in every respect the most suitable for the erection of the proposed monument to the memory of the late Sir John Barrow, Bart., has been fixed upon by the Lords of the Admiralty—that of the Hill of Hoad, Ulverston. The height of the monument is about 100 feet. It is now nearly complete, and will be opened

POSTSCRIPT.

THE PLAYS AT THE PALACE.—There are only two plays to be performed at the Palace at Windsor. The pieces selected are Shakespeare's "Julius Cæsar" and the first part of "Henry IV." The characters of Brutus, Cassius and Mark Antony will be sustained by Mr. Macready, Mr. James Wallack, and Mr. Charles Kean. The part of Falstaff will be acted by Mr. George Bartley The first performance will take place on Feb. 8.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT'S PLAN OF FEMALE EMIGRATION.—On Thursday, at a meeting held in Marylebone, a parochial association, in aid of the central committee formed for the purpose of promoting this object, was established, and subscriptions, besides those announcing in £21 from Lord Dudley Stuart were contributed towards the funds.

NOVEL MODE OF EXTINGUISHING FIRE.—On Thursday, smoke issuing in dense bodies from the premises of Mr. John Bridge, a wine-cooper, in Little Bush-lane, Cannon-street, indicated that a fire had broken out. The engines of the London Brigade, West of England, County, and parish, quickly attended, when the firemen found that the flames were issuing in the cellars running out merely under Mr Beswell's house, but under several others. The engines were got to work, and powerful streams of water were thrown into the basement, but it could not reach the flames. The patent smoke proof doors were therefore sent for; and Bridges, one of the officers, having put the same on, he entered the cellars, where he found a quantity of crates, straw, &c., on fire. By pumping cold air to the dress, Bridges was enabled to continue a considerable time amongst the smoke, and to get at the seat of the fire by the proper quarter, but the fire was not extinguished for several hours. The damage done, however is not considerable except by water. A spark from a lanthorn, it is presumed was the cause of the outbreak.

EXTENSIVE FIRE.—On Thursday night, about eleven o'clock, a fire of a serious nature, attended with a considerable destruction of property, happened at No. 4, Coventry-street, Haymarket, in the tenure of Messrs. Green and Co (late Laidlaw and Rodwell), Court boot and shoe-makers. The fire commenced in the manufactory at the rear of the front warehouse, and in the course of a few minutes the whole of the factory became a general mass of fire. In spite of the exertions of the firemen, they were unable to get the flames under before the half-past twelve o'clock, and not until the premises were levelled with the ground, the valuable stock in trade in the front warehouses seriously damaged, and the whole ruined. Mr. Taylor, stationer, Mr. Sneesby, and Mr. Smith, the latter in the tenure of

NEW YEAR'S EVE, AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.

JUVENILE BALL AT THE MANSION-HOUSE, ON NEW YEAR'S EVE.

THE hospitalities of the Mansion-House of the Chief Magistrate of the City of London have just been extended to a class of citizens who are not usually included in the Mayoralty invitations. Hitherto, if we remember rightly, the sumptuously-spread tables of the Great Hall, the luxuries of the Long Parlour, and the lively enjoyment of the Ball-room, have been monopolised by "children of a larger growth;" but the present Lord Mayor has decided that the children of his fellow-citizens shall no longer be excluded from the Mansion-House festivities.

The occasion has been well chosen for such an extension; and this was Monday last, or New Year's Eve, when the Lady Mayoress gave what is termed a "Juvenile Entertainment," to which were invited several hundreds of the sons and daughters of the citizens, between the ages of seven and fifteen. The company began to assemble at seven o'clock, in one of the ante-rooms, whence they proceeded to the Egyptian Hall, which was beautifully illuminated and embellished for the occasion. The ball was opened by the Lord Mayor, who led off an old-fashioned country dance, with Miss Stanley as his partner; and the Lady Mayoress, with Master Arthur Humphery, son of Mr. Alderman Humphery, M.P. The following was the carte de danse of the evening:—

MANSION HOUSE,

MONDAY, DECEMBER 31ST, 1849.

1. Country Dance.		9. Quadrille	Ernani.
2. Quadrille	Nino.	10. Waltz	Oberon.
3. Waltz (first time)	Vernon.	11. Polka (first time)	Water Lily.
4. Polka	Coquette.	12. Quadrille	La Fadna.
5. Quadrille	La Perl.	13. Schottische	Original.
6. Polka	Drum.	14. Polka	Agnes.
7. Schottische	Original.	15. Sir Roger de Coverley.
8. Spanish Dance.

Mr. Gilbert, M.C. Barnard's Band.

Dancing was continued with much spirit until ten o'clock, refreshments being most liberally served to the company during the evening in the Long Parlour.

At eleven o'clock, the polyphonist, Mr. Love, commenced his popular entertainment, upon a stage erected for the purpose, at the right hand or western end of the Hall. The programme included the performance of "Love in all Shapes," with its five clever portrait-sketches; and then came a vocal sketch entitled "Love's Labour Lost," in which the artiste impersonated various characters, and introduced a variety of striking ventriloquial effects. The vast height and length of the Hall was disadvantageous for the mono-vocal portion of the entertainment; but Mr. Love mastered this difficulty, and his performance, which contains some excellent practical fun, delighted the large crowd of children to their heart's fulness. Indeed, it is just the proper piece of pleasantry to fascinate a child's party.

At about eleven o'clock, the parents and friends of the children joined the party and supper was served. After supper, dancing was resumed till twelve o'clock, when the band played softly the chimes: a deep-toned bell struck the midnight hour, during which the gas-lights in the Hall were gradually diminished, in signification of the old year going out; and when twelve o'clock had struck, the Hall was suddenly re-illuminated, giving a very pleasant effect, the reverse of poor Cinderella's fate. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress then seated themselves at the upper end of the Hall; and the company passed before them, each shaking his Lordship by the hand, and wishing him "a happy new year." The party broke up shortly after twelve o'clock, evidently highly delighted with the evening's entertainment.

THE SUPPER-ROOM

SLEIGHING, OR SLEDGING.

THE ROYAL SLEIGH.

Behold the groves that shine with silver frost,
Their beauty wither'd, and their verdure lost.—POPE.

"Look upon this picture," wheresoever and whensoever it presents itself, and you will see instinct working, with its natural expedients, to guard against, and art labouring, with its cunning contrivances, to grace it. By no means the last, or least, of its embellishments, is that dashing, fiery exercise, if such figure of speech may have allowance, which forms the subject of the accompanying Sketches, illustrative of "SLEIGHING," at Home and Abroad. "Winter, the season of rural leisure, with its bracing breezes, its nipping and eager air," alembic of buoyant spirits, is also the peculiar time of vigorous pastimes and strong exercises. One of the most popular of these recreations among the Northern nations, both of the Old and the New World, is Sleighing, or "Carrioling," as it is sometimes called. No sooner do the groves put on their foliage of "silver frost," than the lithe sledge is everywhere in keen requisition.

"One of the principal amusements of a Canadian winter," writes a North American tourist, "is the sleighing, and a most delightful one it is. Some of the equipages are fitted up with great taste, and at a considerable expense. The Canadian gentlemen decorate their vehicles with costly furs, some of them being lined throughout with this handsome material. The ordinary sleigh, or carriole, as used by the inhabitants, is on low runners or sledges; and, from the body of the carriage being so near the ground, the driver is so much below his horse as to have but little command over him." It will be seen that "they manage these things better in England." The Sketch of the carriole carriole—in which are her Majesty and two of the Royal children—driven by Prince Albert, upon the principle familiar to the dwellers in London since the introduction of Hansom's cabriolet, proves that a sleigh placed upon low runners may, nevertheless, be so constructed as to be divested of all inconvenience or inelegance. The Muscovite machine of that ilk looks, to the coachman's eye, a desperate device, wherein the forlorn hope of safety lies in the very imminence of the peril. Possibly, the driver's head may be far below the range of his courser's heels! Any one in search of a sensation might, with a fair prospect of success, try an airing some fine frosty morning on the bosom of the Neva, behind a kicker. But "use lessens marvels:" the exquisite of St. Petersburg takes his pleasure in a fashion that would make an English steeple-chaser's hair stand on end! As they say in the story-books, "See, here he is."

"The Russian nobility," says Mr. Bremner, in his "Excursions in the Interior of Russia," "have none of that taste for out-of-door exercises which constitute so large a share of the amusements of the higher classes in England. In winter they have abundance of sledge-driving; but, in summer, if they come out at all, it is in their carriages." So soon as snow sufficient to permit the use of the sledge has fallen, the droschkas and tilgas disappear. The rise of the Nile is not of more interest to the Egyptian, than the advent of traineaux, or snow-roads, to the Russian. The sledge then becomes the carriage of every purpose. It is said that during the season upwards of fifty thousand sledges, laden with provisions, enter Moscow daily. The traineaux are the Russians' especial vehicles of luxury. The coachman is seated in front, and behind him reclines the pleasure occupant in indolent enjoyment. The sledge for parade is made of rosewood, mahogany, or some other handsome wood, well varnished, and mostly relieved by a little gilding; the apron being made of cloth to match the seat, and lined and edged with bear skin. The coachman wears a cloth caftan edged with fur, and fastened round his waist by a gay-coloured sash; on his head he has a warm cap, of crimson or blue velvet, with a fur band, and his face ought to be decorated by a handsome and ample beard.

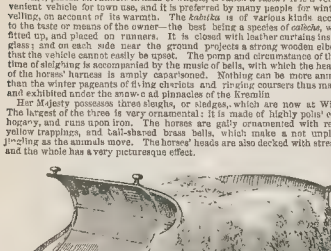
Sledges are sometimes made for family parties, capacious enough to hold ten or a dozen people, and are driven like carriages, with four or six horses. A close carriage, placed on runners instead of wheels, is called a vasok: it is a very convenient vehicle for town use, and it is preferred by many people for winter travelling, on account of its warmth. The kibitka is of various kinds according to the taste or means of the owner—the best being a species of calèche, warmly fitted up, and placed on runners. It is closed with leather curtains instead of glass; and on each side near the ground projects a strong wooden elbow, so that the vehicle cannot easily be upset. The pomp and circumstance of the pastime of sleighing is accompanied by the music of bells, with which the head-gear of the horses' harness is amply caparisoned. Nothing can be more animating than the winter parades of fi-ing chivalry and driving coursers thus made up, and exhibited under the snow-clad pinnacles of the Kremlin

Her Majesty possesses three sleighs, or sledges, which are now at Windsor. The largest of the three is very ornamental: it is made of highly polished mahogany, and runs upon iron. The horses are gaily ornamented with red and yellow trappings, and bell-shaped brass bells, which make a not unpleasant jingling as the animals move. The horses' heads are also decked with streamers, and the whole has a very picturesque effect.



The middle-size sledge, drawn by three grey horses, was, we believe, presented to her Majesty by the Emperor of Russia: it is driven by a coachman in front, and is for only one or two persons. The smallest sledge is for the conveyance of the Royal children. Very handsome skins, leopard, bear, &c., are used as covering for the legs, and as rugs.

MUSIC.

MR. WILLY'S CONCERTS

The room in St. Martin's Hall, in which Mr. Willy gives his classical concerts of chamber music, was crowded to excess at the third of the series, last Monday night. The speculation, however, of giving to the miscellaneous public, at cheap prices, an entertainment, embracing the works of what is termed the "severe" school of music, has fully answered. The result fully bears out the views so long maintained in the columns of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, that the masses may now be safely relied upon to support any undertaking which has for its object the elevation of art. The nights of Mr. Jullien's concerts, appropriated to the works of Beethoven and Mendelssohn, attracted the fullest houses. Mr. Willy has taken the initiative in a very excellent course of action, and other caterers for the public amusement would do well to follow his example. The musical intelligence of the bulk of the people has marvellously improved of late years, and there will be no peril to any enterprise which seeks to promote this art progress.

Monday's scheme comprised Mozart's quartet in C major, No. 6, for first and second violins (Willy and Zerbini), viola (Hill), and violoncello (Reed); Beethoven's grand sonata in G, No. 3, Op. 30, for pianoforte (Sterndale Bennett) and violin (Ernst); Mendelssohn's grand quartet in E minor, for first and second violins (Ernst and Willy), viola, and violoncello (Hill and Reed); and Mendelssohn's grand trio in C minor, for piano, violin, and violoncello, played by Messrs. W. S. Bennett, Willy, and Reed.

The only fault we have to find with the programme is in its disposition. The two pieces of Mendelssohn came together in the same part: one, for the sake of variety, ought to have been placed in the first part. The execution of the selection was, indeed, an intellectual treat. Ernst, as he is in the habit of doing, made of the violin —so as to electrify his hearers almost beyond precedent—is heard in chamber composition to even greater advantage. He individualizes every work by his marked originality of reading, and by an exquisite colouring, so replete with poetry, grace, and fancy. He was encored, with his gifted colleagues, Bennett, in the last movement of the sonata, and also in the scherzo of Mendelssohn's quartet. The talents of Messrs. Willy and Hill are, of course, well known. Mr. Reed is new to us, but he is a valuable acquisition. He is brother, we understand, to the musical director of the Haymarket Theatre; and, if we are right in our surmise, he is a member of a very clever musical family long known in Bath. The vocal pieces were, Mozart's "Voi che sapete" (Cherubino's song in the "Marriage of Figaro"); Macfarren's elegant cavatina, "Ah, non lasciarme!" sung by Mr. Lenl: Mozart's "Madamina," sung by Mr. Bodda; and a canzonet, "Truth in absence," by E. J. Harper, sung by Miss Cobham. The last-mentioned artiste is a débutante of promise, who has been somewhat prematurely brought forward—a mistake so often made by English singers, and their impatient friends or teachers. The canzonet of E. B Harper, a son of the veteran trumpet player, and brother of Messrs. Thomas and Charles Harper, first trumpet and first horn in the Royal Italian orchestra, is quite a gem Mr. E. Harper is, we believe, a pianist, but more of his compositions ought to be heard, considering the exquisite beauty of this canzonet—the melody of which is full of impassioned feeling, whilst there is an under-current of accompaniment in the bass of the Schubert school, rendering the whole air captivating and haunting to the memory.

EXETER HALL WEDNESDAY CONCERTS.

The event of the eleventh concert was the return of Mr. Sims Reeves, who was greeted by an overflowing audience with immense enthusiasm. He was encored in the "Fra poco," from "Lucia;" and in Bishop's ballad, "My pretty Jane." He sang with much power, but his style appears to be somewhat laboured. Mr. Sims Reeves, we perceive, puts the name of the popular tenor in type larger than that which represents the humble names of Ernst and Thalberg. Such is the puffing system, let him at least not expose his "stars" to comparisons which will prove fatal to such pretensions. Talberg and Ernst, albeit in smaller type than Reeves, contrived to create quite a furore; the former being encored in "La Fiska del Reggimento" fantasia, and the latter in his famed "Carnival." An air reading ballad, by Mr. F. Romer, "The Sailor Boy's Return" charmingly sung by Miss Poole, was encored. Mr. Lucombe was encored for his part-song twice Auber's song, "The Breeze," from "Haydée" Mrs. A. Newton was encored in Mozart's song, "Gli angui" of the Queen of Night, in the "Magic Flute," but her intonation was defective, and she altered her cadenza. Auber artfully Miss Dolby and Miss Eyles, Messrs. Land. Leffler, and Smythson, were the other vocalists. Miss Dolby sang very sweetly Wallace's genial "Fireside Song"

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

VERDI'S NEW OPERA, "LUISA MILLER."—It appears from the letter of Adrien de La Fage, dated Naples, December 13, that four representations had been given of Verdi's new work, since its production on the 8th; but, according to the correspondent, the new opera had been coldly received by the Neapolitan public, and even Verdi's partisans displayed little enthusiasm in its favour. The Italians found that "Luisa Miller" was too much in the French school and that there was a deficiency of melodious inspiration, and a want of originality. Verdi received £800 for the composition, and left Naples on the 13th for Genoa. The action of the libretto passes in the Tyrol during the eighteenth century, and it treats of the love of a young girl of the name of Luisa Miller, for the daughter of an old retired soldier. Luisa has been courted by the young nobleman disguised as a hunter, and the father is not opposed to the marriage, until Wurm, a chatelain of the lord of the manor, tells him of the young man's real position as a pauper hunter. Wurm also informs Rodolphe's father of his son's passion: and as it was intended, as in such cases provided, that Rodolphe should marry the Duchess Frederique, on the latter's arrival at the village; despite of which, Rodolphe is resolved to keep faith with Luisa. The Count orders Miller and his child to be arrested, but they are liberated on some whisper from his son, in the way of threat that he will let the world know how the Count gained his title This ends the first act, which is entitled "Love." The second act is entitled "Intrigue." The Miller, having insulted the Count, his feudal lord, is condemned to death; and Luisa, to save her father's life, at the dictation of Wurm, writes a letter to the latter, making a rendezvous to elope with him: and Rodolphe, furious at her supposed infidelity, rejects her. The third act has the awful title of "Poison." Luisa resolves to die, and refuses all food, and she sends for Rodolphe to witness her last moments The lover accepts the interview, and, finding Luisa at her prayers, pours some poison into a cup. He then asks her if she had signed the letter to Wurm? She admits the fact, and Rodolphe then drinks the cup with her. When Luisa finds she is dying, she avows to Rodolphe her motive for writing the fatal letter; and Miller, the father, enters only to see Luisa and Rodolphe perish, the latter, however, giving Wurm his quietus, as a bonne bouche for his treason. Schiller's tragedy, "Kabale und Liebe," has supplied Signor Cammerano with the materials for the poem of Verdi's opera. The Correspondent of the Revue et Gazette Musicale thinks but the Neapolitans are too severe upon Verdi, as there are some striking places in the opera. He praises the opening chorus, a hunting chorus, divided between men and women's voices at a distance, and the finale of the first act, are also applauded. The scene of act 2 is feeble. The duo in the third act, between Miller and Luisa, is very fine, a very good effect in the reprise being obtained by the soprano holding on a note whilst the bass resumes the theme of the duo. The poisoning scene has some good points, and the last trio is artistically constructed for the principals. The orchestration, by Basselli, is Meyerbeerish. Salvezzi, the tenor (Rodolphe), and Madame Gazzaniga, the prima donna, as Luisa, were also effective, but their voices are somewhat fatigued.

ADAM'S NEW OPERA, "LE FANAL."—The Grand Opera-House in Paris has produced this work, but wi h no great success. The libretto is by Mole St. Georges, and is based on the rivalry of two lovers which leads to the attempted destruction of one by extinguishing a lighthouse on the coast of Brittany—a design happily defeated. Poultier, Portehaut, Brémond, and Mdlle. Dameron were the singers. As a short opera to precede the grand ballet, the "Fanal" will be useful. The music is pleasing, but it is not great.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—This evening (Saturday), Mr. John Parry will give the entertainment of "Lights and Shadows," by Mr. Albert Smith, at the Hanover-square Rooms, probably for the last time this season.—On Monday next, at the St. James's Theatre, Mr. Mitchell will commence his French Comic Opera campaign, with Halévy's beautiful opera "Le Val d'Andore," performed for the first time in the country of peculiar Friday. Mr. Calcsmith's "Paul" will be given, for the first time this season, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, conducted by Costa: the vocalists will be Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, Messrs. Lockey, H. A. Meervello, and Herr Formes.

At the Royal Academy of Music, the Board of Professors, consisting of Messrs. Potter, Bennett, Elliot, Lucas, Goss, and Howell, appointed to examine the candidates for the King's Scholarship, has sent in its report to the committee, and the following were elected. Mr. W. G. Cousins, and Miss Martha Street.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

A Mrs. Winstanley appeared on Monday, in the Widow Warren, in the "Road to Ruin," together with a Mr. and Miss Baker, in the parts of Dornton and Sophia. All three manifested a certain amount of respectability, but the acting of the first alone gave any promise of peculiar merit.

On Wednesday Miss Vandenhoff made her appearance in Pauline, in Sir E. L. Bulwer's play of the "Lady of Lyons." The long absence of Miss Vandenhoff from the boards of London, added to the curiosity and anxiety about her success. Her performance of the part was such as to justify even the expectations of her friends It was artistic, impassioned, and dignified. She was warmly greeted, and loudly applauded. Mrs. Wingfield as Madame Deschapelles, fully justified the impression which she had made on her début

SADLER'S WELLS.

The play of "The Gamester" has been revived here, Miss Glyn supporting the part of Mrs. Beverley with dignity and pathos, and Mr. Phelps that of her unfortunate husband with his usual effect. The want of poetic beauty in this drama is, however, severely felt. The domestic sorrows with which it deals, their pain unmitigated by the influence of the ideal, become intolerable from their prosaic reality. Such plays as this and "The Stranger" will doubtless, are long, go the way of "George Barnwell." Assuredly, Dr. Moore and Kotzebue deserve no more respect than Lillo, whose power as a domestic dramatist has never been questioned; and whose skill in constructing tragedy has never been exceeded. But the spirit and aim of his pieces was too humble; and they have accordingly been flily banished from the scene where alone "gorgeous tragedy with stately pall" should be permitted to come "sweeping by:" in order that the public taste may be duly elevated. Mr. Bennett, as Stukeley, was, as the villainous and terrible. But of the rest of the acting we cannot speak in terms of praise. In particular, Miss Fassano, of whom, at the beginning of her career, we had considerable hopes, appears already to have been spoiled by the success she has won upon her, and now performs with a carelessness and—if we may be permitted to use the word—a saltiness of deportment which have become excessively disagreeable and repulsive. Nothing, on the whole, less effective than her present style of acting can be imagined. Miss Fassano has talent, that she may henceforth be roused to proper exertion, and do justice to herself.

Some of the scenes in Mr. Greenwood's pantomime are brilliant; and not a few of the situations effective. The best scene is that in which Mother Shipton. We have her ducked in the well for a witch, and fawned upon by her dog; but some intelligible action might have been accorded to her with advantage. It is, however, too much the custom to write pantomime introductions "without plan," trusting to chance hits rather than to a settled plot

In the pantomime proper, some of the political points are well chosen, particularly those relating to the Jew Bill, and the Hookey-Walker affair. But the attack on the Royal theatricals, and the insult inflicted on Charles Kean—who is made to appear in a grotesque mask—are in wretchedly bad taste, and worse temper. They smack of professional jealousy, and cannot be too soon omitted from the performance.

SURREY.

Mr. Creswick has appeared every evening this week in the tragedy of "Bertram." This tragedy possesses every requisite for the character—his style being, in many respects, singularly appropriate to the peculiar kind of effects to be elicited from the part. The play, besides, has been well put upon the stage. The scene appointments and costumes are accordingly good: and the mission of the shipwreck was remarkably well managed. The houses have been crowded.

STRAND.

Mrs Glover, not having completed her expected engagement with Mr. Anderson, has been permanently included by Mr. Farren in the company of this little theatre. This week she has, accordingly, appeared in the character of Mrs. Temperance, in Mr. Dance's petite comedy of the "Country Squire." Mr. Farren himself supported his original character of Square Broadcloth; and the two nephews were undertaken by his two sons. Miss Rebecca Isaacs performed Fanny Markham and the whole went off very effectively.

OLYMPIC.

Mrs. Mowatt appeared in the part of Beatrice, on Monday, in Shakspeare's comedy of "Much Ado about Nothing." She was warmly welcomed, and played charmingly

ST JAMES'S THEATRE, OPERA COMIQUE.—The season will commence on Monday evening next, by the production, for the first time in this country, of Halévy's opera, "Le Val d'Andore." This charming opera, by the well-known composer of "La Juive," has attained in Paris extraordinary celebrity and success, having reached more than a hundred representations. The cast at the St. James's will comprise all the strength of the company

ARCTIC PANORAMAS.—Lieutenant Browne, late of the Enterprise, informs us that he is busily engaged in preparing the most splendid drawings of the polar regions during the late expedition under Sir James Ross; and these drawings he has allowed Mr. Burford, of Leicester-square, to use.

PUBLICITY TO CASES UNDER THE INSOLVENTS PROTECTION ACT.—Complaints have been made, on the part of persons who have petitioned under the Protection Act, that their names appear in the newspapers, as applicants, four times within the year. In the cases referred to proposals have been made to pay the creditors by instalments, and protection being granted for three months at a time, the cases have hitherto appeared in the printed cause list in order to obtain the necessity of so much publicity, it has been suggested that, if the quarterly payments are made about a week before the date of the protection, the names need not appear in print. There are great many insolvents, especially Government clerks, who will gladly avail themselves of the regulation, and a case appearing before the public The payments must be made before the lists of the week are printed. The subject has been mentioned three times before the Commissioners, and they have expressed their willingness to accept a plan to avoid frequent notice of cases, provided no harm was done to creditors. Persons who were anxious to pay their creditors were not to be placed in a worse position than those applicants who made no proposals to pay their debts.

The new Provisional Federal Commission of Frankfort has already dropped the name of "German Empire" in public documents, and terms that of Germanic Confederation. It has resolved not to have ministers for the different departments, but two councillors to direct each department.

A viaduct is now being constructed over the valley of Goeltzsch, in the Voigtland in Saxony, which will rank among the most gigantic works of modern architecture It will be 240 feet in height. The part which has been a ready completed reaches to about half the height, and has taken 80,000 cubic metres of granite, 10,000 cubic metres of cut stone, and about 5,000,000 of bricks.

On Saturday, the soldiers on guard at the National Assembly (Paris) formed in the courtyard a colossal statue of snow representing the Republic. This fac-simile of the establishment of February attracted the attention of some gamins who commenced bombarding the poor statue with snow-balls, but a sergent-de-ville interposed, saying, "Laissez-la donc, elle sera bientôt fondue."

The Imperial Prussian ukase of 1845, commanding that, by the 1st of January, 1850 every Israelite of the empire shall be prohibited from appearing in the streets and public places of Berlin, either in the Russian or French costume, under pain of an annual fine varying from three to thirty rubles, has now been carried into full execution. The Russian Jews no longer appear in their own costume

We learn from Rotterdam that two-thirds of the city is completely inundated from the high tide. Very considerable damage has been occasioned by it. The Stock of Holland, that famous exterior dyke, has also sustained a breach, and the Nieuwland is completely submerged. Should the hitherto dyke, which is not very strong, give way, serious accidents may be apprehende .

COUNTRY NEWS.

IMPROVEMENT IN LEGAL EDUCATION.—At the monthly board of the Queen's College, at Birmingham, held on the 1st inst., the Right Hon. Lord Lyttelton, the principal, in the chair, Charles Rann Kennedy, Esq., the recently-appointed Professor of Law, submitted to the meeting a detailed statement of his plan of legal instruction. Mr. Kennedy proposed to the Council to give three courses of lectures annually, in the months of May and June, November and December, January and February; each course to consist of thirty or forty lectures, and to give examinations at the close of each term, with three annual prizes to be awarded to the three students who shall, on the whole have passed the best examination. Mr. Kennedy's proposal was unanimously adopted.

THE PREDICTED HIGH TIDES.—The prediction of a Leamington gentleman, that, in consequence of the moon being in perigee, the tides would rise to disastrous height on Saturday and Sunday last, has not been fulfilled. Nothing has occurred except what would certainly have happened during any other spring tide, with a strong wind blowing on the land. Portions of the east coast have suffered, but the inundations, although causing much alarm, were not of a more serious character than those which have frequently occurred in the winter season. At Yarmouth the tide was higher than it has been for many years, but not sufficiently so to cause any serious damage. At Lowestoft it

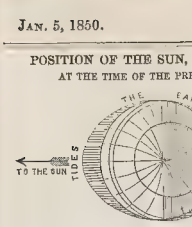
POSITION OF THE SUN, MOON, AND EARTH, AT THE TIME OF THE PREDICTED HIGH TIDES.



THE Moon moves round the Earth in an elliptic orbit, and, therefore, she is at times nearer to the Earth than her average distance, and at other times she is farther from it. Her greatest influence over the tides is when she is at her least distance from the earth.

The influence of the Sun in raising the waters is small in comparison with that of the Moon. When both the Sun and the Moon are in the Equator, and the Moon is at her least distance from the Earth, the tides are raised the highest of all, particularly if the Moon be either full or new. On Dec. 29, 1849, neither the Sun nor the Moon was in the Equator, which circumstance would have a diminishing effect upon the tides, for, as the Moon was distant from the Equator, one of the highest elevations of the water follows her, and the other is on the opposite side of the Equator. There was no reason, therefore, to expect high tides on the last days of the year, as we stated in our paper of Dec. 8, in answer to Correspondents.

The alarm so universally created by the announcement that the waters of the Thames at the present spring tides would place in jeopardy (by their great rise) the immense property upon its banks, has happily passed away. The event predicted may very likely have been in a great measure prevented by the wind having chopped round to the westward at the time predicted. The consequence was, that our present spring tides were very little higher than ordinary ones.

The highest tide this spring occurred on the 1st instant, and the rise on that occasion, at Vauxhall Bridge, was less than twenty feet above the Trinity House mark of low water; whereas the mark on the upright pile at that place shows the tide of the 12th of December, 1845, to have been twenty-three feet—a yard higher than on this dreaded occasion.

We seek not to invalidate the calculations of science, and readily admit that on our north-eastern coast the astronomer's prediction was to a certain extent fulfilled. Suffice it, there has been little or no damage done on the banks of the Thames.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

LONDON AND BRIGHTON.—With the commencement of the new year this company's express trains have been accelerated. Those between London and Brighton run the distances in an hour and a quarter, and those to Hastings in two hours and a quarter.

CALEDONIAN.—This company have given notice to the Scottish Central Company of their intention to discontinue the working of that line, which is considered tantamount to an abandonment of the agreement existing between them.

COMMUNICATION WITH THE CONTINENT.—Arrangements that will greatly facilitate Continental travelling have been made by the South-Eastern Railway Company, in conjunction with the Boulogne and Amiens and Northern Railway Company, to come into operation on the 1st instant. Travellers will now be enabled to book themselves through, and obtain direct tickets from London to Paris, and vice versâ; and, through the medium of the Northern of France Company, arrangements have been completed for the issue of direct tickets from London to Brussels, Malines, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Cologne, and there is to be no examination of luggage until the passengers arrive at their destinations. These direct tickets issued at the London-bridge Station of the South-Eastern Railway are available by any of the South-Eastern and Continental Company's steamers performing the service between Folkestone and Boulogne, and by the English and French Government mail-packets, as well as the company's steamers running between Dover and Calais. Thus there is afforded to passengers the choice of embarking in the morning, afternoon, or evening. From London to Cologne on the Rhine, the fare by the first-class is under £3, and by the second-class, £2 5s.

The engineers of the York and North Midland Railway have commenced, at the port of Bridlington, measuring for the extension of the railway on the new pier, with the intention of exporting coals, and increasing the trade of the place.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—Some of the men who had been employed on the Midland Railway, and who recently "struck," have returned to their work at the reduced rate of wages; but the great bulk of the porters continue to insist on the higher rates of payment. Unfortunately there have been some accidents among the new men; one of their number, at Hunslet, suffered injuries from the fall of two heavy trucks, another man from the removal of trunks, and it is said that on the whole the carrying trade has been much impeded.

GREAT WESTERN.—This company intend constructing warehouses at their Paddington terminus, to accommodate the traffic in corn and flour, which of late has increased considerably.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC FOR 1849.—The receipts from all sources on 46 railways for the past year, amounted to the sum of £19,876,866, of which sum railways for the past year, amounted to the sum of £19,876,866, of which sum £8,330,700 was received from passengers, and £4,346,166 for goods. The entire number of miles open was 5063¾. The highest sum taken in one week was by the London and North-Western. It amounted to £92,031; but the fluctuation, owing to the cholera and other causes, was so great, that for several weeks the receipts were as low as £34,000. The number of miles opened by the North-Western was 478¾, and the entire receipts for the year £2,154,400. The company which approximated nearest to the North-Western in its receipts was the Midland, the earnings of which amounted to £1,117,803.

NORTHERN OF FRANCE AND BOULOGNE AND AMIENS.—A dispute having arisen between those companies as to whether the former was bound to make the same reduction in its charges for the passage on the line of the Boulogne trains as it had effected on those to Calais, the matter was carried before the Tribunal of Commerce, and it has decided that, according to the cahier des charges, the Northern Company shall allow the Boulogne company to participate in any reduction of tariffs it may effect on the line from Paris to Calais.

WINDING-UP OF JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES.—The Master in Chancery, who has the winding-up of the affairs of the late St. George's Steam-Packet Company, proposes to make a call of £100 on each £100 share, and £25 on each £25 share, held by those contributories included in the settled list, and upon whom no other call has yet been made. Two abortive calls have been made on the Norwich Yarn Company, and the Liverpool Crown Glass Company, have just been brought under the operation of this act.

THE IRISH GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN.—The Great Southern and Western Company have shown themselves alive to the public feeling and to an enlightened sense of their own interest, by accelerating the speed of the third-class trains to and from Dublin. At present, indeed, the extent of the acceleration is small; but it is to be hoped that the progress of intelligence upon this subject will lead to a further advance in the same direction.

WILTS, SOMERSET, AND WEYMOUTH.—The directors at their last meeting resolved on making a final call of £5 per share on the £50 shares, payable the 7th inst.

FRENCH LINES.—The Council of the Ponts et Chaussées have just approved of the plan of a branch line from the Northern Railway, which will unite Valenciennes and Belesmont. The valley of the Sambre will be placed in communication with Paris by this branch, which will also facilitate the transport of the coal of the Sambre to the iron foundries of Valenciennes.

BRITANNIA-BRIDGE.—The tube has attained an altitude of 70 feet, and needs only five lifts more to place it.

SUNDERLAND DOCKS.—The works of these docks, in connexion with the railways, are now completed.

THE EARL OF ELLESMERE AND THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—For some months an active competition has prevailed between the trustees of the Bridgewater Canal and the London and North-Western Railway, in consequence of which the goods between Liverpool and Manchester were carried at unusually low rates. Negotiations have been carried on for some time between the rival carriers, and have terminated in an amicable understanding. With the commencement of the new year the old rates are resumed.

FRIGHTFUL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday evening an accident occurred on the East Lancashire Railway, at the Maghull station, attended with less of life. A train left Preston at a quarter before eight in the evening, with only one carriage attached to the engine. At Ormskirk station there was a considerable accession of passengers, for whom there was not adequate room. When the train arrived at Maghull, there was a spare carriage on the siding, and the railway officials were endeavouring to get it across the line on to the other rails when an alarm was given of a train coming up. The passengers jumped out, and, it being dark and the utmost confusion prevailing, three were caught by the engine, and killed on the spot. The bodies were picked up in a most mutilated state. They have not yet been recognised.

FRENCH POST-OFFICE.—The Director-General of the Post-office has published a notice at Paris, that henceforth letters for Great Britain and the British colonies, and Belgium, and the German States, the mails for which are sent by the Northern Railroad, will be received, if pre-paid, or bearing post-office stamps to the amount of the postage, at the post-office, in the Place Lafayette, up to seven o'clock in the evening, for transmission the same night.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W F—Origin of the term "Rook."—Authorities are at issue at to the signification of the word "Rook" as applied to one of the Chess-pieces. It appears to have been derived from the Indian name for the Persian Roch, or Rook, the name being still preserved by the Persians, Arabians, Turks, Tartars, Indians, Malays, &c.; and by some authors it thought to signify a fabulous bird of a prodigious size; by others to be the name of some animal, which carried men and baggage, as the dromedary, or camel, in the Eastern armies. Some take it to mean an armed chariot, which might have been harnessed to dromedaries and placed on the wings of the army in the form of cavalry. The Oriental nations represent the piece which we call the "Rook" by the figure of a cornet mounted by a soldier, with a bow and arrow in his hand; and the rapid march of the piece, which in former times was the only one which could move from one extremity of the field to the other, accords very well with the idea.

MATILDA—Its years must be reckoned by thousands, for by its early name, Tschaturangi, we find Chess mentioned in the most ancient language of the East.

A YOUNG HAND—Y-s can have any piece you choose except a second King.

YORICK—The Chess-Player's Chronicle, published by Hurst and Co. King William-street, Charing-cross.

A S. North Shields; ARDENT, WILEY—You ought to know that a Pawn advancing two steps can be taken by an adverse Pawn in passing and that your pretended solution of Problems Nos 305 and 306 is therefore childish.

A M, Liverpool—Thanks. We have already expressed our intention of giving them.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER, Belfast. The notice to "Pa inures" and "Rooneats," in the last Number but one, refers to the new Chess pieces called the "Staunton Chess-Men."

S T C—They can be got in ivory and wood of Leuchars, 38, Piccadilly; where also you may obtain the rules for "Double Chess."

E H T—The "Sphynx" was composed by the Rev H Bolton, and it can be solved as you suggest.

J N, Highgate; AN AMATEUR—It appears to us impracticable.

F R S—Get Kling's quintal collection of Chess Problems called the "Chess Euclid," published at Sacks, of King William-street, Charing-cross.

BELLARY.—Many thanks: the Problems reached us safely. The other subject of your letter shall be suggested to one of our artists.

SIR G S—The following seems shorter:—1. R to Kt 8th; 2. B to K B 3rd; 3 B to Q sq (ch); 4. P to Q Kt 4th—Mate. Is not this a true solution?

VALLETFIELD.—It is precisely similar to "Damiano's" smothered mate, erroneously attributed to Philidor.

JUVENTUS—There is a Chess Club held at the Lecture Room, Hill-street, Peckham.

J T S, Twyford—The Anniversary Soirée of the Reading Chess Club is appointed for the 15th inst. Apply to the Secretary, Mr Hodges, Junior, Reading, Berks.

M S—See the notice to UNCHESHAIN in our last Number.

C F G—Ingenious, but too easy. Try again.

W C, Runcorn—They shall be reported on next week.

Solutions by Hermes, York; S Mesaire, M E L A; A Morgan, F O, C M G, Lancet, Valleyfield, Juventus, F N, Gambit, are correct. Those by S F H, Cuzzga, Bellary, J N, Annan, Pimlico, are wrong.

In 1849, in a population of 1,034,285, the deaths were 10 950 in private practice, and 8041 in the civil and military hospitals, making a total of 18,991.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE MONMOUTH ASH.

A PIECE of interesting historical and traditional illustration has just appeared in a periodical entitled "Notes and Queries," lately commenced as "a medium of inter-communication for literary men, artists, antiquaries, genealogists, &c." A better proof of the working of this new literary plan could scarcely be found, than in the example we are about to quote.

In the first Number of the "Notes and Queries," there appeared a letter from Mr. Bruce, the well-known antiquary, referring to Mr. Macaulay's account of the "Battle of Sedgemoor," as being rendered singularly picturesque and understandable by the personal observation and tradition which he has brought to bear upon it. Mr. Bruce then asks whether Mr. Macaulay's account of the capture of Monmouth might not derive some additional life-giving touches from the same invaluable sources of information. The passage runs as follows:—

"On Cranbourne Chase the strength of the horses failed. They were therefore turned loose. The bridles and saddles were concealed. Monmouth and his friends disguised themselves as countrymen, and proceeded on foot towards the New Forest. They passed the night in the open air; but before morning they were surrounded on every side. * * * At five in the morning of the seventh, Grey was seized by two of Lumley's scouts. * * * It could hardly be doubted that the chief rebel was not far off. The pursuers redoubled their vigilance and activity. The cottages scattered over the heathy country on the boundaries of Dorsetshire and Hampshire were strictly examined by Lumley; and the clown with whom Monmouth had changed clothes was discovered. Portman came with a strong body of horse and foot to assist in the search. Attention was soon drawn to a place well fitted to shelter fugitives. It was an extensive tract of land separated by an enclosure from the open country, and divided by numerous hedges into small fields. In some of these fields the rye, the peas, and the oats were high enough to conceal a man; others were overgrown by fern and brambles. A poor woman reported that she had seen two strangers lurking in this covert. The near prospect of reward animated the zeal of the troops. * * * The outer fence was strictly guarded; the space within was examined with indefatigable diligence, and several dogs of quick scent were turned out among the bushes. The day closed before the search could be completed; but careful watch was kept all night. Thirty times the fugitives ventured to look through the outer hedge; but everywhere they found a sentinel on the alert: once they were seen and fired at; they then separated and concealed themselves in different hiding-places.

"At sunrise the next morning the search recommenced, and Buyse was found. He owned that he had parted from the Duke only a few hours before. The corn and copsewood were now beaten with more care than ever. At length a gaunt figure was discovered hidden in a ditch. The pursuers sprang on their prey. Some of them were about to fire; but Portman forbad all violence. The prisoner's dress was that of a shepherd; his beard, prematurely grey, was of several days' growth. He trembled greatly, and was unable to speak. Even those who had often seen him were at first in doubt whether this were the brilliant and graceful Monmouth. His pockets were searched by Portman, and in them were found, among some raw peas, gathered in the rage of hunger, a watch, a purse of gold, a small treatise on fortification, an album filled with songs, receipts, prayers, and charms, and the George with which, many years before, King Charles the Second had decorated his favourite son."—Hist. Eng. i. pp. 616 618. 2nd edition.

Mr. Bruce adds: "Now, this is all extremely admirable. It is a brilliant description of an important historical incident. But on what precise spot did it take place? One would like to endeavour to realize such an event at the very place where it occurred, and the historian should enable us to do so. I believe the spot is very well known, and that the traditions of the neighbourhood upon the subject are still vivid. It was near Woodyate's Inn, a well known roadside Inn, a few miles from Salisbury, on the road to Blandford, that the Duke and his companions turned adrift their horses. From thence they crossed the country in almost a due southerly direction. The tract of land in which the Duke took refuge is rightly described by Mr. Macaulay as 'separated by an enclosure from the open country.' Its nature is no less clearly indicated by its local name of 'The Island.' The open down which surrounds it is called Shag's Heath. The Island is described as being about a mile and a half from Woodlands, and in the parish of Horton, in Dorsetshire. The field in which the Duke concealed himself is still called 'Monmouth Close.' It is at the north-eastern extremity of the Island. An ash tree, at the foot of which the would-be King was found crouching in a ditch, and half hid under the fern, was standing a few years ago, and was deeply indented with the carved initials of crowds of persons who had been to visit it. Mr. Macaulay has mentioned that the fields were covered—it was the 8th of July—with standing crops of rye, peas, and oats. In one of them, a field of peas, tradition tells us that the Duke dropped a gold snuff-box. It was picked up some time afterwards by a labourer, who carried it to Mrs. Uvedale, of Horton, probably the proprietor of the field, and received in reward fifteen pounds, which was said to be half its value. On his capture, the Duke was first taken to the house of Anthony Etterick, Esq., a magistrate who resided at Holt, which adjoins Horton. Tradition, which records the popular feeling rather than the fact, reports that the poor woman who informed the pursuers that she had seen two strangers lurking in the Island—her name was Amy Farrant—never prospered afterwards; and that Henry Parkin, the soldier, who, eyeing the skirt of the smock-frock which the Duke had assumed as a disguise, recalled the searching party just as they were leaving the Island, burst into tears, and reproached himself bitterly for his fatal discovery.

"It is a defect in the Ordnance Survey, that neither the Island nor Monmouth Close is indicated upon it by name."

The facts here stated are partly derived from the book known as "Addison's Anecdotes," and were more or less used by the late Rev. P. Hall, in his "Account of Ringwood," and by Mr. Roberts, in his "Life of Monmouth." It is then suggested that a Dorsetshire Correspondent might state whether the ash-tree is now standing, and what is the actual condition of the spot at the present time.

This intimation brought, in about a month, the following communication from the Earl of Shaftesbury, the distinguished owner of the ash tree:—

"The whole of Woodlands now belongs to me. The greater part of it was bought by my late brother soon after he came of age.

"I knew nothing of Monmouth Close till the year 1787, when I was shooting on Horton Heath: the gamekeeper advised me to try for game in the inclosures called Shag's Heath, and took me to see Monmouth Close and the famous ash tree there.

"I then anxiously inquired of the inhabitants of the neighbouring houses respecting the traditions concerning Monmouth Close and the celebrated ash tree, and what I then learnt I have printed for the information of any person who may visit that spot.

"What I have since learnt convinces me that the Duke was not going to Christchurch. He was on his way to Bournemouth, where he expected to find a vessel. Monmouth Close is in the direct line from Woodyates to Bournemouth.

"About sixty years ago, there was hardly a house there. It was the leading place of all the smugglers of this neighbourhood.

ANGEL VISITS.

A LYRIC FOR THE NEW YEAR.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

THOU'RT old, grandfather—old,and blind,
But ever cheerful, good, and kind.
I love, when early summer blooms,
And meads are lavish of perfumes,
To see thee in thy garden chair,
With silvery locks, and forehead bare,
And face upturn'd, as thou hadst striven
To look through darkness into Heaven.

II.

And oft, when o'er the frozen wold
The wintry tempests whistle cold;
When strolling gusts, in sport or ire,
Howl down our chimney at the fire;
When crickets chirrup on the hearth,
As if they shared the children's mirth,
My last day's lesson I repeat,
Or read my Bible at thy feet.

III.

But now the summer days have come,
With song of birds and insect hum;
The swallows dart from cottage eaves—
The earth is bright with flowers and leaves;
The shadows through the foliage fall,
Like net-work on the garden wall;
And ship-like clouds go sailing by,
In the calm ocean of the sky.

IV.

Around our porch the tendrils twine,
And bind-weeds clasp the eglantine.
The summer day is fair and mild—
Come, lean upon thy little child;
And let me guide thee to thy seat—
I'll do my knitting at thy feet;
Or, should the time be dull or long,
I'll read, or sing, my last new song.

V.

But far more happy I should be
To sit, and hear, and learn from thee.
Oft when thou'rt musing all alone,
No eye upon thee but mine own,
I hear half-spoken words that seem
Replies to questions in a dream;
And watch observant from my place
The placid rapture on thy face.

VI.

And it would please me, would'st thou tell
Thine own, thy little Rosabel,
What thought, amid thy sight's eclipse,
Can bring the smiles upon thy lips.
Old age, I've heard, is full of care,
But thou art happy—thine is fair—
So fair (and yet it cannot be),
I think that Angels visit thee.

VII.

Dear Rosabel, 'tis even so,
There are more Angels than we know.
Lend me thy hand, my seat prepare—
Let me inhale the morning air,
Receive the sun-light on my cheek,
And feel thy presence as I speak,
And I will tell of Angels three
Who daily come and visit me.

VIII.

Though I am frail, and old, and blind,
God sends his sunshine to my mind.
'Twas He bestow'd the visual ray,
'Tis was He who took the gift away.
But when his chastening hand withdrew
Earth's outward forms from sensuous view,
He open'd to my mental sight
The inner spirit infinite.

IX.

And self-communion, calm and long,
Deep musings upon right and wrong,
And conflicts with the pride and sin
That ever surged and swell within,
Clear'd from my soul the mist obscure,
And fill'd it with revealings pure:
I saw myself, and, humbled low,
Drew comfort out of deepest woe.

X.

I see no more the fields and bowers,
Nor endless beauty of the flowers;
I see no more the rivers run,
Nor hill-tops gilded by the sun;
I see no more Creation's grace,
I see no more thy gentle face;
And all the glory of the skies
Is hidden from my wither'd eyes.

XI.

But when I hear the wild wind call
To forest boughs, that answer all;
The sedges rustling in the lake,
The blackbird whistling in the brake;
The far-off murmurs of the shore,
Deep-throated ocean's moan and roar—
Remembrance wakens in my mind,
And paints the pictures of the blind.

XII.

'Tis then an Angel, one of three,
Descends to bear me company.
Sweet are the accents of his tongue—
He keeps my heart for ever young.
In his companionship, I stray
Back to my childhood's early day;
And live again a wond'ring boy,
Heir of a world of life and joy.

XIII.

With him I hold communion fit—
His voice makes music where I sit.
I listen, and before me pass
World-shadows in a mystic glass.
The torrent falls, the landscape spreads,
The steadfast forests nod their heads,
And the eternal oceans roll,
In the clear mirror of my soul.

XIV.

Whene'er the early cuckoo's voice
Bids me and all the meads rejoice;
Whene'er I find a new delight
In opening day or closing night;
Whene'er I sit in sun or shade,
And bless the world and Him who made,
And feel the joys I cannot see,
I know this Angel visits me.

XV.

And evermore when he departs,
Another cheers my heart of hearts,
With soft blue eyes, two azure spheres—
Bright with the luxury of tears.
Sweet is the song of early birds
Yet sweeter far are human words—
This Angel loves them; so do I—
He links me to humanity.

XVI.

Whene'er thy father, pleased with home,
Has smiles for all who go or come;
Whene'er, his daily labour done,
He breathes his evening orison;
Whene'er thy mother—good and mild,
Sings lullaby to soothe her child,
I feel a sympathy sincere
And know this Angel hovers near.

XVII.

Whene'er I hear the children play
With many a chant and roundelay;
Whene'er the trample of their feet
Makes music round my lonely seat;
Whene'er I hear these sing thy song
In happy innocence of wrong,
And love all children, these the best—
I know that Angel is my guest.

XVIII.

Whene'er I hear of generous thought—
Of noble deeds by manhood wrought;
Of patience long and sorely tried,
Walking with Virtue, side by side;
Of love supreme amid distress—
Of courage great in gentleness,
And feel the tears suffuse my eyes,
I share angelic sympathies.

XIX.

Whene'er I hear of sin and guilt—
Of human blood in warfare spilt;
Of wrong, and suffering unrelieved—
Of tender innocence aggrieved—
Of harsh oppression, hate and scorn,
Yet feel not utterly forlorn,
But hopeful of a time to be—
I'm sure that Angel visits me.

XX.

And Rosabel, dear Rosabel,
Another Angel—mark me well—
Sits at my side by night and day,
And teaches me to hope and pray;
He bids all doubt and sorrow cease—
He fills my soul with heavenly peace,
And sings me the eternal hymn
Of the adoring seraphim.

XXI.

And oft when sleep forsakes mine eyes,
He lifts a veil of mysteries,
And shows me, strong in humble faith,
Life-shadows, and the things of death;
He takes the terror from the tomb,
And strews rich germs of heavenly bloom
Upon the dark sepulchral clod—
That Angel is the Love of God.

XXII.

O Angel! heavenly Angel mine!
His words are harmonies divine.
In his companionship serene
All earthly joys are poor and mean;
The world hath come—the world must go—
Th'immortal longings throb and glow;
I feel no more the primal curse,
I clasp the boundless universe.

XXIII.

And yet I doubt, O daughter dear,
If all these Angels hover here—
So sum as is each to each,
So like in feature, form, and speech;
So linked in one celestial plan
Are love of Nature, God, and man:
I cannot think that they are three—
'Tis but one Angel visits me.

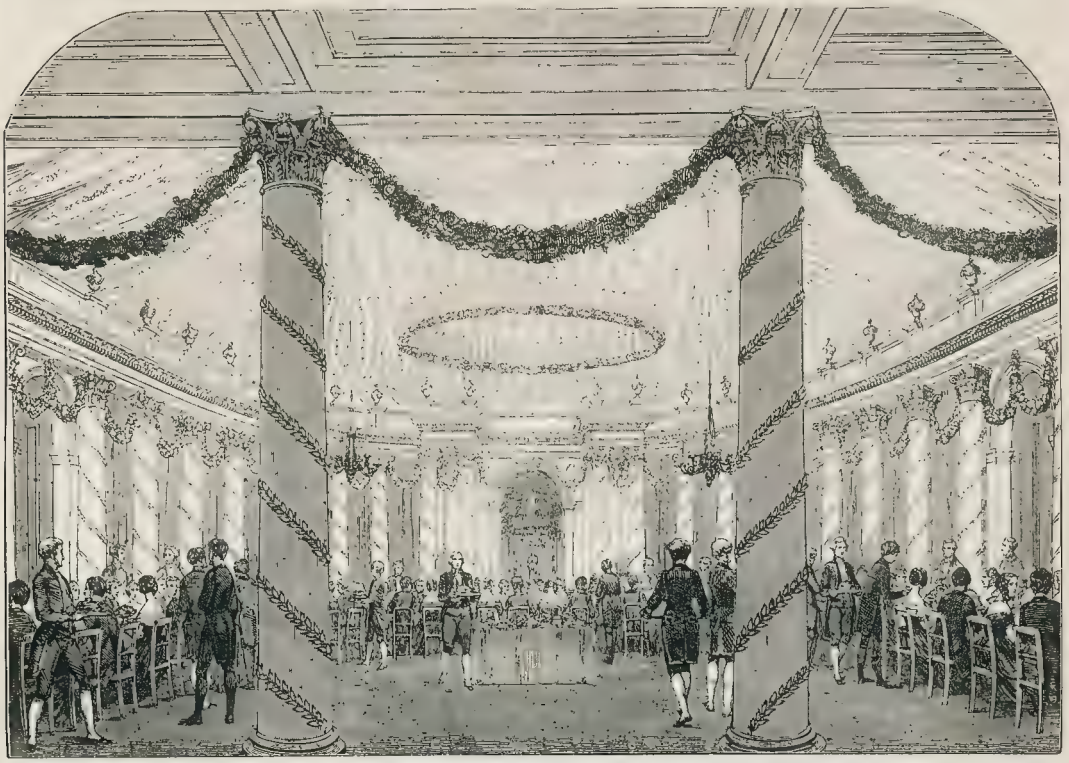
FESTIVITIES AT TRENTHAM, TO CELEBRATE THE MAJORITY OF THE MARQUIS OF STAFFORD.



THE GRAND BANQUET.

THE Marquis of Stafford, eldest son of the Duke of Sutherland, attained his majority on Wednesday, December 19, 1849; and the auspicious event was celebrated by a succession of festivities at Trentham, and in various parts of the counties of Stafford and Salop. The munificent spirit with which the Trentham family have long been accustomed to promote and patronize every good work, has been extended to these festivities: the event has been celebrated, says the Staffordshire Advertiser, at the paternal home, with becoming splendour, and the Duke and Duchess have dispensed their hospitality to such an assemblage of birth and rank as this county does not often witness:—

But while they entertain the rich,
They ne'er forget the poor;

and the benefactions which from day to day have gladdened the heart of poverty for miles around the estates of Trentham and Lilleshall, will cause the joyous event they were intended to celebrate long to live in the remembrance of grateful thousands.

Besides defraying the expense of an entertainment to the inmates of several Union Workhouses, gratuities were distributed amongst the out-door poor, to a considerable amount; and further donations of £25 each were forwarded to the Mayor of Newcastle, the Chief Bailiffs of Hanley, Stoke, and Longton, the Chief Constable of Burslem, and the Deputy High Steward of Stafford, to be disbursed in some charitable manner.

TRENTHAM.

The preparations at Trentham were on a very extensive scale. In anticipation of them, abundance of good cheer was provided, some fifty sheep and about a score of fine oxen were slaughtered, and several hogsheads of the far-famed ale of the Duke's cellars were broached. Flags were hoisted at the inn, and on some of the houses. There were handsome triumphal arches of evergreens erected over the entrance to the Park from the village, and at Ash-green.

On Tuesday, beef, bread, and ale, in ample quantity, were distributed to the cottage tenants on the Trentham estate.

At day-break on Wednesday, a band of music perambulated the village. In the course of the morning, deputations from the Mayor and Corporation of Newcastle, and the Shropshire tenantry, arrived at Trentham, for the purpose of presenting congratulatory addresses to the Duke of Sutherland and the Marquis of Stafford.

About noon, the Newcastle and Pottery Troop of the Queen's Own Royal Staffordshire Yeomanry Cavalry were reviewed opposite the Hall, and fired three rounds in honour of the event of the day.

THE GRAND BANQUET.

In the evening there was a grand dinner party, in a magnificent apartment temporarily formed by roofing over what is called the West Court, the area within the semi-circular corridor which forms the principal entrance to the hall. This apartment was constructed under the superintendence of Charles Barry, Esq., R.A. In front of the billiard-room, into which the apartment opened, there was a row of Corinthian columns corresponding with those of the corridor, and so placed as to form a gallery for musicians, and the ceiling was composed of crimson and white drapery, ornamented with wreaths and festoons of evergreens. The corridor was shut out from the apartment by rich drapery suspended between the columns. Around the cornice, a string of gas jets was continued all round the apartment, and these, with chandeliers of wax lights, brilliantly illuminated the whole place, and a hoop of wax-lights was suspended, by wires, from the ceiling. The principal table was nearly semi-circular, with small tables at the sides. Ornamented with the costly plate of the entire service from Stafford House being in use on the occasion), there was a large collection of the beautiful statuettes and other works of art manufactured by Messrs. Copeland and Messrs. Minton, of Stoke-upon-Trent, the principal productions of their respective establishments. The dinner service was also of Staffordshire porcelain, of exquisite beauty. Many of the ornaments of the table were a mixture of parian and gold and silver plate.

The visitors were received in the drawingroom, and entered the dining-room through the conservatory, which, with some of the magnificent apartments, being seen through the arches of the corridor, had a splendid effect when lighted up, and produced an effect of marvellous beauty. The whole appeared a fairy hall, with a never-ending succession of gorgeous apartments.

Covers were laid for ninety. The Marquis and Marchioness of Stafford occupied the post of honour, having seated between the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland. Among the company were—The Marquis and Marchioness of Kildare, Lady Constance Leveson Gower, Lord Frederic Leveson Gower; Earl Talbot; Lord Ingestre and Lady V. Talbot; Lady Lichfield, Lord and Lady Ashley, Lady E. Anson; Earl of Ellesmere, Lady A. Egerton, Hon. Mr. Egerton, and Hon. Algernon Egerton; Earl of Carlisle, Earl of Harrowby and Lady Harrowby; Earl Granville, Earl Grosvenor, Lord Edw. Howard, Lord Clifden, Lady Dover, and family; Dean of Lichfield and family; Hon. Edward and Mrs. Howard; Hon. W. S. Lascelles and family; Hon. Frederic Leveson, Hon. Edward Coke, Asa Loch, Esq., M.P., Captain Grenfell, Lord Loch, Mr. Hope, Mr. Hope Scott, Ralph Sneyd, Esq.; Sir David Dundas, Hon. Mr. Bagot; Mrs. Cunliffe Offley and Miss Crewe; Thomas Fitzherbert, Esq.; Fras. Fitzherbert, Esq.; John Fitzherbert, Esq.; Edward Butler, Esq., and Mr. Butler, jun.; Capt. and Mrs. Molyneux; Capt. Fonys; Ralph Adderley, Esq.; Mrs. Adderley, Mr. Thomas Adderley, and the Misses Adderley; C. Barry, Esq. R.A.; J. A. Wise, Esq.; F. Twemlow, Esq.; Wm. Davenport, Esq.; J. Harvey, Esq.; Chas. Harvey, Esq.; Thomas Bain Rous, Esq.; Thomas Hawe Parker, Esq.; Sanford Caldwell, Esq.; Edward Abernethy, Esq.; Herbert Minton, Esq.; Frederic Tomlinson, Esq.; Thomas Fenton, Esq.; Dr. Bromhall, Rev. J. E. Edwards and Mrs. Edwards, Rev. John Hutchinson, Rev. Henry Bunsen and Mrs. Bunsen, Rev. H. Bence, &c. Among the gentlemen unable to accept their Grace's invitation we may mention George Tollet, Esq., and Alderman Copeland, M.P.

The dinner was a most splendid and recherché entertainment.

The health of "Her Majesty the Queen" having been proposed by the Duke of Sutherland, and drunk with suitable demonstrations of loyal attachment, the Earl of Ellesmere rose, and in a few remarks, which were received with cheers, the health of his young relative, "The Marquis of Staff rd." The toast was drunk with rapturous applause, and was feelingly responded to by the noble Marquis. The health of "The Duke of Sutherland" was proposed by the Earl of Carlisle, who paid a graceful tribute to the many virtues of his noble relative, being emboldened to do so, as he said, by the infirmity of hearing, under which his Grace laboured. The Duke of Sutherland acknowledged the demonstration of attachment with which the toast was drunk, and expressed the pleasure he felt in being surrounded by such a distinguished party on so joyous an occasion. The Earl of Harrowby gave the health of "The Duchess of Sutherland," and the Earl Granville the health of "The Marchioness of Stafford," both of which toasts were most happily proposed and received with cheers. The latter called forth another responsive address from the Marquis Earl Talbot proposed "The Bishop of Lichfield and Clergy of the Diocese," which was acknowledged by the Dean of Lichfield. Amongst the other toasts were, "The Staffordshire Potteries and Mr. Minton," proposed by the Marquis of Kildare; "Mr. Barry," proposed by Lord Edward Howard; and "The Lord-Lieutenant and Members for the County, with Mr. Twemlow." These toasts were respectively and most suitably acknowledged by Mr. Minton, Mr. Barry, and Mr. Twemlow. A band of stringed instruments in the gallery, and a brass band stationed in the conservatory, played alternately during the dinner.

From the dining-room the party returned to the suite of drawingrooms, the whole of which were thrown open, and had a dazzling effect.

The appearance of the Great Conservatory was splendid and striking. Under four orange trees, of remarkable dimensions, the tea and coffee tables were set out, and on each of them, encircling such trees, were twenty-one candelas, emblematic of the majority of the Ministry of Lord Melbourne, all unimaginative plinths. Other orange trees were placed in the room, so as to give the appearance of a grove. In the branches of the trees over the tables, small figures of cupids, in Parian, were placed, and at the end of the conservatory a group of the semble was exquisitely beautiful in character. The company began to separate about half-past ten.

During the evening, and until far on in the night, the gardens, the drive through the park, the margin of the lake, and the monument, were brilliantly illuminated. An excellent band was stationed in the terrace.

There was also a dinner party to celebrate the event, at Trentham Inn; and the village was crowded with holiday-keepers till a late hour at night

On Thursday, the North Staffordshire h unds met at Trentham Hall, being an especial day in honour of the Marquis of Stafford and his friends.

On Friday evening, a large party of the Duke's Staffordshire tenantry assembled at Trentham Hall, in pursuance of invitations sent to them by his Grace, and sat down to a grand entertainment at five o'clock.

The reports of the rejoicings in Staffordshire and Shropshire fill ten columns of the Staffordshire Advertiser. At Newcastle, Stoke-upon-Trent, Hanley, and Shelton, Stone, Stafford, and Wolverhampton, there were public dinners, and rejoicings for all classes; as well as at Newport and Shrewsbury. The enthusiasm, in short, nothing could exceed the enthusiasm with which the event was celebrated, or the sincerity with which the public and private worth of the Trentham family were attested throughout the above districts.

It may be interesting to add, that two large Views of Trentham Hall and its beautiful gardens, appeared in No. 385 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—The charitable bequests of the late Rev. Joshua Paley, B.A. 1828; M.A. 1832, of St. John's College, P.C. of Pemberton, Wigan (whose death took place on the 12th ult., have been made public. He sets apart out of his personal estate the sum of £1000, of which the interest of £500 is to be paid to the incumbent and churchwardens of Pemberton for the time being, yearly, for the benefit of the church schools, for ever; and the interest of the remaining £500 to the same officers for the benefit of the choir. He also gives, in case the sum of £2 for the sermon at the Feast of the Dedication of the organ which, at the expens of about £500, he erected in the church at Pemberton Mr Paley commenced his labours in Pemberton (the church being opened on the 4th of August, 1839), at a salary of £70 per annum, the patron of the Hon. Mr. Bridgman, and continued by the Rev. H. J Gunning: also, about £30 per annum from the dues. This he gave, and more, in his visits to the sick and poor, and existed upon that and the fees received by his pupils. During these years ago he got the grant of £100 per year from the Government Commissioners for the equalisation of poor livings.

BATHS AND WASH-HOUSES IN FRANCE.—A short time since, a gentleman, M. Pitolet, from the Bureau of the Minister of Commerce and Agriculture, was sent to this country to collect information relating to our baths and wash-houses for the industrious classes. M. Pitolet inspected very minutely the model establishment in Goulston-square, Whitechapel, and likewise devoted considerable time to the examination of the drawings, not only of that building, but of others which Mr. Bailey is now erecting. He then requested the Committee for Promoting the Establishment of Baths and Wash-houses to favour him with copies of the plans of which they most approved, with the reports which have been printed from time to time, and also a copy of a paper on drying the clothes of the washers, which had just been prepared for the committee. These drawings and papers were sent to Paris, and the enclosed translation of a letter addressed to the Rev. Sir Henry Dukenfield, acknowledging their receipt, has just been received :—

Paris, Dec. 26, 1849

... have read with the most lively interest the documents which you have been so kind as to forward to M. Pitolet, and which relate to the numerous philanthropic works of your country. I thank you for them. I have received a so the plans which you have sent to me. The President of the Republic proposes to make as much as possible in France the formation and revolvement of al. institutions which are for the benefit of the people. Those which have the public health for their object are of an importance which is fully felt by the Government. I intend, some time hence, to present to the Assembly the documents of a project de loi for the establishment of public baths and wa h-houses, which I shall without delay submit to the National Legislative Assembly. M. Pitolet, in consequence, is sending you the various documents which will be published by my department. Philanthropy has accomplished wonders in overcoming the harm-resisting difficulties of society ... Intercourse when takes place among m n, inspired by sentiments of devotion to the good of their fellow-creatures, will be productive of great results.

Receive, sir, the assurance of my great re ... &c.,

To Sir Henry Dukenfield London. LUCAS, Minister de l'Agriculture et du Commerce

LAYING OF BROTHERHOOD.—Our Brotherhood has just been formed in Paris to co-ope ate with the League of Brotherhood in the country, for the dissemination of peace principles on the Continent This committee already comprises the names of Victor Hugo, the Abbé Deguerry, M. Cormenin, and M. Crepon; and other members are expected to give in their adhesion. This committee has made arrangements to dine together every month, when the operations of the society will be discussed and directed. A monthly "Olive leaf" will be issued by the committee, containing short paragraphs adapted to the popular mind in France. This will be followed by post every month to about 800 newspapers, with a request to the editors to insert each of the articles as they may approve in their respective journals. By thus feeding the continental press, it is hoped to imbue public sentiment abroad as well as at home with the principles of peace and brotherhood These "Olive leaves" are also to be distributed by hand among the ouvriers of Paris and other large towns. An effort will be made, in accordance with a suggestion of M. de Lamartine, to form corresponding committees in all the principal towns in France, in this way the combined influence of many of the most progressive minds on the Continent will be brought to bear in promoting the widest possible extension of peace and brotherhood.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE attention of the racing community has been taken up this week solely by the 1st of January nominations for Chester, Liverpool, Epsom Spring, York, Doncaster, Newmarket, and a variety of other meetings, and it is gratifying to us to be able to report, that, although the Chester Cup shows a considerable falling off, the average is highly satisfactory.

Field sports have been stopped by the frost, which, if not severe, has taken sufficient hold of the ground to give the horses and hounds a holiday.

The Steeplechase Calendar is "blank" as regards next week, and the coursing fixtures embrace none of any attraction to the metropolitans. They are Newcastle (in Monmouthshire) on Tuesday; Ruthin (Wales), on Tuesday and Wednesday; Hornby, on Wednesday and two following days; the South Lancashire and Caledonian open on Thursday and Friday –of course, "weather permitting."

RABY, WINNER OF THE CAMBRIDGESHIRE STAKES, &c.—A portrait of this racer, from a picture by Henry T. Davis, in the possession of James Meiklam, Esq., is now in the engraver's hands, and will shortly be published by Moore, of West-street, St. Martin's-lane, where the painting will be on view for a few days.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

EXPEDITION TO THE ARCTIC REGIONS IN SEARCH OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN It is now fully anticipated that an expedition will proceed at an early period in the spring, to make further search in the hope of meeting with Captain Sir John Franklin, and the officers and crews of the missing expedition—the Erebus and Terror. This expedition will be fitted out by private enterprise, and entrusted to the command of Captain Sir John Ross, already celebrated for his voyages to the arct c regions; and it is but justice to state that Sir Felix Booth is exerting himself in a most laudable manner in this undertaking. It is contemplated to have a fast-sailing brig, the best description of "clipper" that can be attained, with a light draft of water, and that she should be accompanied by a steamer—and a screw propeller will be preferred—in order to tow the vessel through the ice when requisite. From the known energy and perseverance of Sir John Ross, and the promises of volunteers, whose knowledge of the northern regions has been tried on several previous occasions, there is every reason to hope the expedition will be successful in the object contemplated. The long absence of the missing voyagers will give a double interest to the undertaking; and the knowledge of two searching expeditions being despatched, one by the Government round Cape Horn to Behring's Straits, and the other by private enterprise to the Arctic Seas, will, it is hoped, relieve Lady Franklin ultimately to Melville Island, will create a spirit of emulation with every prospect of favourable results

ROYAL MARINES.—It is rumoured that Colonel Powell retires early in the ensuing year. The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have given directions for the men of the Royal Marines to be in future paid three times a week, instead of twice, as heretofore.

THE FLEET OF THE FUTURE.—Rear-Admiral Hornby, C.B., Commander-in-Chief in the Pacific, has been ordered to proceed from Valparaiso, with all the men-of-war he can collect, to Nicaragua, and place his squadron at the disposal of the Royal Navy. In charge of this force the British Government against the designs and encroachments of the Yankees in that quarter. It is said that Vice-Admiral Lord Dundonald, Commander-in-Chief in the West Indies will also assemble all the ships he can get together on that station, and proceed to the Mosquito shore with the same view.

THE Contest, 12, Commander the Hon. J. Spencer, bound for the coast of Africa, with mails, came into Plymouth on Sunday from Portsmouth. On the 4th firing for the Queen's birthday was commenced on board the Contest. It appears a part of the old fuse had been by accident left in the touch-hole of the gun, and while the seaman was ramming in the charge, the powder ignited, and an explosion took place, which so shattered the poor fe low's arm as to render amputation necessary.

Captain Urquhart, of the Royal Marines, whose supposed authorship of certain obnoxious strictures upon the discipline of his service caused the Admiralty to withdraw the pension of £100 per annum which he had held as one of the Royal Marine corps, has been presented by the Secretary-at-War with the paymastership of her Majesty's 59th Regiment at Hong-Kong!

THE FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.—Great Britain and Ireland.—Royal Artillery—2 troops horse brigade, 10 companies of batalions and detachments, 1160 gunners and drivers; 10 dragoon regiments, 4000 rank and file, 24 infantry regiments, 10 infantry depôts, 31,000 rank and file; officers of Royal Engineers and recruiting parties, 510; together with 21,400 enrolled pensioners, and 12,000 constabulary, horse and foot.

THE COMMISSARIAT.—Since the promotion of 1846, two Commissaries General and fourteen Assistant Commissaries-General have died, and all these vacancies remain unfilled, with the exception of one Deputy-Commissary-General, who, in 1847, was promoted to the rank of Commissary General.

MILITARY OBITUARY FOR 1849.—During the year the following number of general and other officers of the higher ranks have died :—2 Field-Marshals, 8 Generals, 8 Lieutenant-Generals, 7 Major-Generals, 8 Colonels, and 43 Lieutenant-Colonels.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Although Consols have received the decline which marked the close of last week's business, the market during the past week has been anything but firm. The opening price on Monday was 96 ex div, improving to 96¼ ⅞, and on the following day to 96¼ ⅜, Wednesday, notwithstanding considerable amount of business, the quotation receded from the opening price of 96⅞ to 96⅝, closing at 96⅝ to ⅞. On Thursday, however, the supporters of the market again made large speculative purchases, and the settlement on the following day, although the amount of sale of Long Annuities must necessarily be invested in Consols, the price of the latter advanced to 96⅞. In Reduced and New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, a large amount of business has been transacted, the former having recently become a favourite investment. Exchequer Bills maintain the high quotation of last week, and India Bonds have advanced a trifle. At the close of business the market was tolerably steady, at the following quotations :—Bank Stock, 204; Reduced, 97; New 3 per Cent. Annuities, 96⅝; Long Annuities, 15⅞; Annuities, 1860, 8 9-16th; Ditto, 20 years, Oct. 10, 1859, 8 5-16th; Consols for Account, 96⅝; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 61 pm.; £500, June, 61 pm.; Small, 61 pm.

In the Foreign Market there has been a fair amount of business doing; Fernan Stock, however, shows the greatest advance. The opening price on Monday was 19¼, from which it has gradually risen to 20. Mexican, also, has a firm, maintaining the rise of the previous week. In Portuguese Four per Cents, some comparatively considerable transactions have been effected. The market is, at the close of the week stood, for Buenos Ayres Bonds, Six per Cent, 40¼; Danish Bonds, 1825, Three per Cent., 73¼; Ditto, Five per Cent., 100, Grenada Bonds, One per Cent., 16¼; Mexican, Five per Cent., 1845, 1 x Jan. Coupon, 20½; Peruvian Bonds, Four per Cent, 62; Ditto Deferred, 20¾; Portuguese Four per Cents, 36⅝; Ditto, Account, 37; Spanish Five per Cents, 1840, Account, 19⅝; Ditto, Coupons, 9; Ditto Three per Cent, 37¾; Venezuela Bonds, Deferred, 9⅝; Belgian Four-and-a Half per Cent., 89; Dutch Four per Cent. Certificates, 80½.

Railway stocks have been very heavy, but towards the close of the week, an improved feeling prevailed. Eastern Counties, Great Western, and Southeastern were in better demand, at slight advances, although the amount of business doing was small, as the annexed quotations of actual bargains will demonstrate :—Aberdeen, 11¾; Buckinghamshire, 16¾; Caledonian, 10¾; Ditto, New, £10, Preference, 7¾; Eastern Counties, 4¾; Dutch Five per Cents, 1840, Account, 19⅝; Ditto, Coupons, 9; Ditto Three per Cent, 37¾; Venuzuela Bonds, Deferred, 9⅝, Belgian Four-and-a Half per Cent., 89; Dutch Four per Cent. Certificates, 80½.

The Consol Market on Friday was again firm, and prices advanced fully ¼ per cent., the Three per Cents for the next Account being done at 97¼ to ⅜; sellers at the former price. The Unfunded Debt was firm, but Foreign Bonds and Railway Shares were somewhat neglected.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Up to our market this week, consequently, only 1160 quarters of English wheat have come to hand, hence the show of samples of best red and white have to day was small in the extreme. The attendance of mill-rs being limited, the demand for all kinds of wheat of home produce was in a very sluggish state, at Monday's quotations. The imports of foreign wheat have been confined to 2540 quarters. All descriptions were very dull to sell; but we have not the slightest change to notice in value. With barley both foreign and English samples were scarcely supplied. On the whole, a moderate business was transacted, at previous currencies. Malt was in good supply, and brisk demand, at barely stationary prices. Good sound oats were scarce, and quite as dear. The inferior parcels realised dull. Peas and beans, and all other articles, were firm.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, is 0d; barley, is 0d; oats, is 0d; rye, is 0d; beans, is 0d; peas, is 0d.

Flour.—The finest brisk demand has sprung up for the inferior kinds of Congou, the prices of which have advanced fully 1d per lb. Common sound is selling at 10d per lb. In most other kinds a moderate business is doing, yet late rates are fully supported.

Sugar.—A moderate business has been transacted in most descriptions of raw sugar, at fully last week's quotations. Refined goods are dull, at 2s per cwt. decline. Grocery goods move somewhat lower Brown lumps, 59s, and fair, 56s 6d to 57s per cwt. Crushed sugars are dull, but unchanged.

Coffee.—Further advanced rates have been paid for native Ceylon. During the week, 13,000 bags have changed hands at 55s to 66s per cwt. In other kinds of coffee a steady business is doing.

Rice.—We have rather more inquiry for this article, the stock of which is upwards of 21,000 bags. In other descriptions prices are without change.

Provisions.—Although the demand for most kinds of foreign butter is in a sluggish state, prices are well supported. Fine Belfast is selling at 96s per cwt. The demand for Irish butter is inactive. Fine Dorset, 96s to 98s; middling ditto, 86s to 90s per cwt; fresh, 9d to 12s per dozen lbs. There is rather more doing in Bacon, the prices of which have an upward tendency. Prime sizeable Waterford, 43s to 47s; heavy, 41s to 43s; Limerick, Clonmel, 40s to 42s; and heavy, 40s per cwt. Current Cork, forward delivery, at 47s to 49s. Lard and hams are quite as dear as last week

Tallow.—Small parcels, on the spot, have sold at 38s to 38s 3d; and for forward delivery, 38s 3d to 3s 6d per cwt. Town tallow, 37s to 39s 6d per cwt, net cash

Oils.—Linseed oil has sold to some extent, on speculation, at an advance in the quotations of 30s per ton Otherwise, the market is steady.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 6s to £3 10s, clover ditto, £3 0s to £4 10s; and straw, £1 8s to £ . 8s per ton.

Spirits.—Brandy continues in steady request, at fully last week's quotations Cognac, of the vintage of 1811, is selling at 4s 2d to 4s 3d per gallon; and as 6d is asked for finer. Rum is tolerably firm Geneva and corn spirits dull

Wool.—A fair average amount of business is doing in this market, at late figures. The imports continue small

Potatoes.—Fine samples are held at from 90s to 110s per ton. In other kinds—the supplies of which are very abundant—very few transactions have taken place, and the quotations are lower

Hops (Friday).—Our market is very moderately supplied with all kinds of hops, especially with fine new qualities. Generally speaking, the demand is in a very sluggish state, at last week's quotations.

New Mid and East Kent pockets, £6 10s to £12 6s; New Weald of Kent ditto, £6 5s to £8 5s; Old ditto, £2 5s to £4 5s; Sussex ditto, £3 5s to £4 5s; Farnhams, £4 5s to £7 15s; Yearling Sussex, £3 5s to £4 15s; Yearling Sussex, £2 5s to £3 17s; old hops, £1 0s to £4 0s per cwt.

THE FRENCH INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITION.

PISTOL, BY GROHÉ.

IN DECEMBER 1st, we gave a series of illustrations of the class of Art in this Exposition. We now return to the subject, in order to present a few Specimens, more remarkable for their novelty of design and beauty of finish.

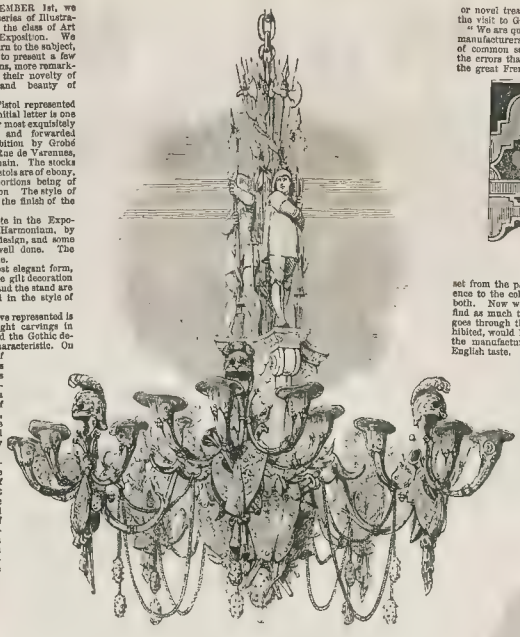
The Pistol represented in our initial letter is one of a pair most exquisitely worked, and forwarded for exhibition by Grohé frères, Rue de Varennes, St. Germain. The stocks of the pistols are of ebony, richly carved, the remaining portions being of beautifully wrought steel and iron. The style of the enrichments is Gothic, and the finish of the work is most admirable.

Amongst other objects of taste in the Exposition, we should mention an Harmonium, by Debain. Its exterior is of good design, and some of the ornaments exceedingly well done. The tone of the instrument is very fine.

The Cup, by Bruneau, is of most elegant form, and beautifully ornamented. The gilt decoration round the lower part of the Cup and the stand are in good taste, characteristic, and in the style of the Renaissance.

The Cover of the Missal we have represented is one of the most delicately wrought carvings in boxwood we have ever seen, and the Gothic design is exceedingly elegant and characteristic. On the scroll beneath the bas-relief in the centre, which represents the descent from the Cross, is sculptured in slightly raised letters, "Jésus descendu de la Croix." All the enrichments of this cover being of open-work, and mounted on a pale blue ground, the effect is most tasteful and light. It is manufactured by Gruel, of the Rue Royale.

The Chandelier, by Charpentier, is one of the most elaborate and picturesque specimens of French art displayed in the Exposition. It would suit most admirably a hall or armoury, from the weapons both defensive and offensive of which the chief ornaments are composed; and even the chains festooning and enriching the lower portion of the composition are in strict character, being intended to represent parts of morning stars—the stars, or balls set with spikes, forming pendants to the chains. The same anachronism—that of combining classic and mediæval arms and armour—is observable in the grouping of this Chandelier, as in the candelabrum we engraved a few weeks since.



CHANDELIER, BY CHARPENTIER.

CUP, BY BRENEAU.

The Portière (hanging or a doorway), and the piece of Tapestry, are from M. Sallandrouze's manufactory. The spirit of the design, and the harmony of colour, in these specimens is highly commendable.

The Brooch forming the subject of one of our Cuts is by Rudolph, and is an excellent imitation of cinque-cento work. It is made of gold, enamelled white; the precious stones set in it are brilliants, with the exception of those in the pendants and the large stones in the centre, which are emeralds. The small figures are made of silver, and a good effect is produced by the silver being oxidized.

Lastly, in the Lid of a Casket, inlaid with buhl and enamel, manufactured by Laurent, of Paris, the unity of design and simplicity of the ornament employed are worthy of note by our manufacturers in papier mâché. The dark tint is of a blue colour; the middle tint represents the buhl; the remainder being white, with the exception of the border, which is a dark wood. Altogether, this has a very beautiful effect.

We find, in the Journal of Design for the present month, the following sensible observations upon the Exposition:—

"'Coming events cast their shadows before,' and a portion of the great exhibition of the Industry of All Nations in 1851 has its forerunner in the gathering made from the last Exposition Industriel in the French capital, for the inspection of the English public. Daily reports from all quarters—from manufacturers, designers, and schools of design—show that there is a general training or preparation for the coming struggle, and that the worlds of manufacture and of industrial art are awakening to the importance of the event: the eyes of all men must then be directed to them and to their labours; and they will do wisely to neglect no means that may conduce to their improvement, and enable them to advance the national reputation. Among these means, that of seeing what our neighbours are able to produce, which is thus offered, is most desirable. We may thus endeavour to emulate their excellences where they do excel us, and, while awarding them their due meed of praise, make strenuous efforts, ere the time of trial comes, to lessen the distance by which they head us in the race; we may, moreover, find suggestions or novel treatment both in design and in manufacture, which will well repay the visit to George-street, Hanover-square.

"We are quite sensible what a dangerous exhibition this may become both to manufacturers and designers, as we fear it is to the general public; a due share of common sense, therefore, is important to the visitors, to guard them from the errors that surround them. As for ourselves, we have carefully inspected the great French Exhibition in their own capital, as well as this small offset from the parent stock, and our remarks, while having immediate reference to the collection of M. Sallandrouze, will have regard in some degree to both. Now we feel bound to say, at the outset, that, as regards design, we find as much to avoid as to imitate. Any one, with an educated eye, who goes through the rooms in George-street, and looks at the designs there exhibited, would be led to believe that the designers have selected their works, as the manufacturers have their goods, for what in their opinion is the state of English taste.

"This, we know, is the course which the Parisian artists pursue towards the British manufacturers who visit their capital for designs. If this is not the case, then French design has a higher reputation than it really deserves, and we think it a duty to make a sincere effort to warn those who are on the look-out for a novelty to beware. In all that respects the educated art-workman, the French are indeed far ahead of us in the race: let the visitor, to assure himself of this, look carefully over the bronzes and biscuit figures from Sèvres. After the former are cast and the latter come forth from the mould, the skilled workman has done his part bravely: look at the heads and extremities of the statuettes of Molé, Descartes, Pascal, &c.; for the artist-like treatment and the knowledge of the parts displayed in their finishing, the hands of some of these are quite studies, whilst the English workman would most probably have left them like gloved hands without marking of tendon or articulation, as they would be without character. The chasing of the bronzes, both figure and ornament, is worked with equal intelligence and hand-skill. The china painting from Sèvres bears out the same remark: some of the flowers and shells on the plates, the figures and ornament on the tazzas, imitated from those of Raphael and Julio Romano, are truly beautiful, more like the works of those who are more especially devoted to the fine arts than the labours of art-workmen. Let the manufacturer, then, take from this his first lesson; let him educate his own workmen, for without this all the skill of the designer will be useless."

THE CLAIMS AND POSITION OF LITERATURE.

THE recent death of an eminent historian, who, during the last years of his life, enjoyed a small pension from the Government, has invested the question of literary pensions with a temporary interest, and excited a controversy upon the expediency of such grants. It is desirable that this question should occasionally be mooted, and that the position of a class of men who exercise so large an influence over the mind and character of the nation should be well considered, with a view of discovering whether society does its duty by them, and whether they, on their part, do their duty by society. Nothing but good can flow from the discussion.

The Government of this country is supposed to set aside the small sum of £1200 annually to be granted in pensions to men eminent in science and literature. This sum, however, does not reach them. There are other claimants upon it, who intercept it in its progress; and sums of £400 and £500 out of this fund find their way into the pockets of individuals, who, whatever may be their claims upon Royalty or the country, have none upon this particular fund. But, leaving this circumstance out of the question, and supposing that the £1200 per annum is religiously devoted to the reward of the persons for whose benefit it is granted, Literature may well ask, whether such a niggardly recognition of its claims be worth accepting, and whether it would not be more consonant with its dignity to refuse the alms even of a great nation, and put forward a new claim—not of favour, but of right?

Upon the general question of the claims of literature and literary men to the respect and honour of a civilised people, there can be no doubt. Literature is a mighty teacher; and in our day the general diffusion of a knowledge of reading and writing among the masses of our population extends its influence into sub-strata of society where formerly its light never penetrated. The literary man is, more than ever, the priest and teacher of the people. It is our duty and interest, as a state, to see that the pressure of worldly circumstances (generally adverse to the man who is wiser than the masses, and who devotes himself to intellectual pursuits—not always the most profitable in a purely commercial country) does not force him to the unhappy alternative of writing for a degraded, rather than for a cultivated taste—to the level of the half or imperfectly informed multitude, rather than to the level of the wiser few. As long as literature remains a mere thing of the shop—a purely commercial speculation, in which author and bookseller engage for the sake or profit, so long will there be a class of writers who will have it in their power to inflict injury upon the community by pandering to its vices, its prejudices, and its ignorance. So long, also, will there be another and a scarcer class inspired by nobler sentiments—the missionaries of a holier cause, who will devote themselves to literature for the love they bear it, and die its martyrs.

The influence of literature is daily becoming more extended; and its power to degrade is, unluckily, as great as its power to exalt the intellect and the morality of the people. Any one who examines into the present state of the cheap literary market, will be appalled at the unblushing effrontery, the shameless pruriency and open vice which are exhibited in publications that appeal for support to the ignorant many. The Government of a free and a highly-civilised state might well afford to present a few prizes of the many at its command to excite the honourable ambition of men of literary ability. Nothing could possibly be lost, but much would assuredly be gained by such policy. A highly influential class would be recognised as a power, and that power would be more uniformly exerted than at present in support of virtue against vice, of order against disorder, and of wisdom against ignorance.

At the same time, while the State held out to the young and the aspiring these prizes—prizes, be it remembered, which the army, the navy, the church, and the law offer in large numbers to these better recognised and more fortunate professions—it ought to be ashamed of neglect or niggardliness towards the aged and the unworldly, who might, in the course of a useful life, have conferred honour upon the name and the literature of England. No greater calamity can befal a civilised people than the miserable death of its benefactors. Burns, the poet, is the glory of his country; but Burns, the wretched, self-degraded excisesman—what Scotchman can think of him without a blush or a sigh for the generation of his countrymen that allowed of such a termination? Milton's name is a tower of strength to the English language, and endears the soil of this little island to the hearts of millions of a kindred people who never beheld it. Englishmen are proud of the name; but when they reflect that its possessor, old and blind, was obliged to descend from a high and honourable position in the service of the State, and yoke himself to the uncongenial and ill-paid drudgery of a daily school, they lament that their forefathers were not wise enough to know the great man they possessed amongst them. It were needless to multiply such instances. They are but too familiar to all who can read, and never fail to call forth the sincere regret of those who think that nations great in wealth, in power, and in intellect, ought to be great both in generosity and in justice. There ought to be no sum of £1200 set apart to pension those who have political influence, or who have devoted their pens to the service of a party; but there ought to be a discretionary power, vested in the Minister of the day, to reward, during life, such of the nation, the man who has exalted literature without benefitting himself—whose power fails him in the day of calamity, or who has attained old age without attaining a certainty of bread. All such cases ought to be met as they arrive, without reference to £1200 or any other sum. This, and the chance of employment in departments for which their talents might qualify them, would not be too great a recognition of the claims of literature to the encouragement of a wise and educated people.

This, however, is not all that might be accomplished. Literary men have it in their power to help themselves more than they have ever done, and to acquire that status in society which is due to the pretensions of those who exercise an influence so remarkable and so general. In spite of their own want of cohesion—in spite of the fact, that, in a country where wealth and rank are the great objects striven for by the majority, they have most of them only used literature as a stepping-stone to ulterior things—and that they have pandered, against themselves, to the old prejudices, that literary men were mere quacks and pretenders on the one hand, or, on the other, that they were impracticable, and not to be trusted in affairs requiring tact and talent, rather than genius, to carry to completion—in spite of all these things, the tendency of opinion in our day is to exalt literature, and to overwhelm the literary man with popular applause. A popular author need not die before attaining his apotheosis: the multitude are but too anxious to shout in his train. Let literary men use the means at their command to cultivate this feeling in the people—to make literature a recognised profession, and to exclude from it, as jealously as the army, the navy, the law, the church, and not to be trusted in affairs requiring tact and talent, rather than genius, to carry to completion—in spite of all these things, the tendency of opinion in our day is to exalt literature, and to overwhelm the literary man with popular applause. A popular author need not die before attaining his apotheosis: the multitude are but too anxious to shout in his train. Let literary men use the means at their command to cultivate this feeling in the people—to make literature a recognised profession, and to exclude from it, as jealously as the army, the navy, the law, the church, and medicine, the unworthy and the ignorant. Let them strive, in fine, for the incorporation of the literary co-fraternity; let them procure the seal of authority upon their efforts, like any other recognised profession, and they will do more than any government could do, however well disposed to aid them. The present time is not unpropitious for the attempt. The amiable Sovereign has literary sympathies, which she has evinced privately, in the most kindly and graceful manner. The Prince Consort has similar tastes; and there would be little or no difficulty in procuring the countenance of those illustrious personages to any well-considered and properly supported project of giving English literature such a status as its elevation to a corporate existence could afford. Why should there not be an English Institute of Literature—affiliation with which would of itself confer rank and distinction? It is no mean honour to be a member of the Academy or of the Institute of France. We know of nothing in the English character, or in the circumstances of literature and literary men, to prevent the institution of similar corporations amongst us.

MILITARY, NAVAL, AND COUNTY SERVICE CLUB,

ST. JAMES'S-STREET.

THIS Club was formed in November, 1848, by a committee of noblemen and officers of distinction; amongst whom we find, as patrons, his Majesty the King of Holland, his Grace the Duke of Leeds, Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Napier G.C.B., Colonel the Earl of Cardigan, 11th Hussars; Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, R.N.; the Right Hon. Shaw Lefevre, M.P., Speaker of the House of Commons; Lieutenant-General Sir Augustus De Butts, K.C.H., Colonel Commandant Royal Engineers; the Marquis of Donegal; Colonel the Hon. R. H. Clive, M.P.; Hon. Rice Trevor, M.P.; Colonel C. G. K. Tynte, M.P.; the Earl of Glengall; Viscount Castlereagh; the Marquis of Huntley, &c.

The Club admits to membership the lord and deputy lieutenants of counties; officers in the army and full and half pay, officers in the Royal Marines and the Hon. East India Company's Navy on full and half pay, officers in the militia and yeomanry, officers in the Hon. East India Company's military service, officers retired from the regular, militia, and naval forces, the militia and yeomanry, and the Hon. East India Company's military and naval services.

The number of members is limited to 1800, of whom already more than half have been elected. One of the originators of the Club is Arthur Sleigh, Esq., late Lieutenant 77th Regiment, who is the Secretary.

The Club occupy the superb mansion, No. 80, St. James's-street, late Crockford's. We have engraved the grand drawing-room, a splendid apartment, with an entire frontage in St. James's-street, of fifty feet by forty wide. The style of decoration is that of Louis Quatorze. The ground-colour is azure; and the coving of the ceiling, and its panels, as well as the panel mouldings on the walls, are richly gilt. The door-frames and head-ways are also gilt; and above each is a painting à la Watteau, in a gilt scroll-work frame, as also above the pier-glasses, which are very large. The chimney pieces are of marble, and above each is a lofty glass. The enrichments of masks, terminal heads, &c. throughout the room are heavily gilt; and from the centre of the ceiling hangs a large cut-glass chandelier. The carpet is of dark rich colours; and the furniture mahogany and morone morocco of first-rate manufacture, by Dowbiggin.

The other apartments of the Club, and approaches thereto, consist of a grand entrance hall, of sculpta marble, supported by marble pillars, with heavily-gilt capitals. The stone staircase ascends on two sides to the upper corridor, leading to the grand drawingroom, the writing or Blue-room, and the magazine and green drawingrooms. The cupola of the hall is profusely gilt, and partly filled with richly stained glass; from the apex, the arms of the Club form an upper cupola or lantern light, from the centre of which is suspended a large bronze and gold chandelier for gas.

In the lower entrance hall, right and left, are mahogany doors, leading to the coffee-rooms, each forty feet long by thirty feet wide, facing St. James's-street. To the right is the "members'" coffee-room; and to the left the "strangers'," where members are privileged, under certain restrictions, to introduce friends to dinner, &c. Behind the strangers' coffee-room is the house dinner-room, where once a week a dinner is provided for sixteen members.

From the grand drawingroom, hearing gilt doors, and on the right to the Blue-room, which is devoted exclusively to writing letters. The coruice in this room is one of the most superb and elegantly-designed pieces of carving in the house. The ceilings of the entire suite of rooms are richly ornamented with bronze gilt, which tempers the more dazzling richness on the principal.

Another gilt folding-door leads from the right into the octagonal green recess, a chaste ornament, with snakes and vases in two angles, and a superb stained glass window in the centre. From this miniature apartment are three doors which do ors. each richly gilt upon a light pink ground, which adds to the contrast with the pale hues of the room, itself green and gold.

This magazine-room adjoining is a beautiful apartment, with gilt mouldings, also on a green ground, with four superb mirrors, from the ground to the ceiling—two on either side. From the centre of the suite of apartments hang rich glass chandeliers.

The furniture of the rooms is of a superb description; the carpets were made (expressly for the Club) of the richest material; the curtains are of crimson pile velvet. A story has been added to the upper suite of rooms, in which are a smoking divan, billiard-room, complete dressing-rooms, &c. We need scarcely add, that the kitchens and cellars of the Club are on a complete and extensive scale.

LOLA MONTES AND HER HUSBAND.—The Daily News gives the following extract of a letter from Cadiz, Dec. 27:—"Lola Montes and Mr. Heald have been for the last ten days in this city, having come from Barcelona. She is much altered and aged, not so good-looking as when here in 1842. Her temper is not at all improved, and her delight seems to be to keep Heald in the greatest terror and dread of her. Heald made his escape, with his English servant, from the hotel Iamenaz (where they were staying on Christmas morning), and is supposed to have gone to Gibraltar. Lola was furious. She went in a French steamer that evening with her two friends, foreigners, who are in her party, to Algeciras, and sent lamaenz and another man by land; so that, if Heald does not succeed in getting on board the Pacha, she hopes to catch him. It is reported on good authority to-day, that Heald has embarked this morning on board the Pacha, and he will now be enabled to reach England in safety, and no doubt, feels grateful to his aunt for all she has done for him." A weekly contemporary states that Mr. Heald has arrived in London, and put up at an hotel in Cork-street, Burlington-gardens.

On Saturday afternoon, two lads, named Smith and White, in the employment of Mr. Robinson, cigar manufacturer, Cross-lane, St Dunstan's-hill (City) quarrelled, and grapp.ed with each other. After a short struggle, White said, "If you don't let me go, I will st 2 you," and immediately fulfilled his threat, by stabbing Smith in the abdomen with a knife, which he took from a bench. The wounded lad was taken to St. Thomas's Hospital, where he now lies, and White is in custody.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

The question of La Plata has again engaged the Legislature in Paris this week; the committee, to which it had been referred back, made a supplemental report, in which it rejected the amendment of M. de Rancé, granting 10,000,000f. for an indemnification against Rosas, because it considered that it ought to be left to the Government to apportion the means to the end in view, and also because it was impolitic to fix the precise amount of the grant, as it would be the means of informing the adversary of the maximum of the efforts France would be disposed to make against him. The report concluded by a new amendment, suggested by the committee, to the following effect:—"The National Assembly invites the Executive Power to support the negotiation, which it now prepares to enter on, by forces sufficient to ensure its success, as well as the safety of the French subjects at La Plata." On the presentation of this report, M. de Rancé declared that he withdrew his former amendment, for which he now substituted the following:—"Considering that the Le Prédour treaty has not been submitted to the ratification of the Legislative Assembly, whereas the Government declares that it intends to continue the negotiations, for the purpose of guaranteeing the honour and interests of the Republic; and considering that under any circumstances the French in La Plata will be properly protected against any eventualities which may arise on the banks of the Plata, the Assembly passes to the order of the day."

In the discussion that ensued, M. Thiers raised his voice for war. He strongly supported the necessity of an armed expedition. England and the United States had monopolised the transport of coal and cotton, those commodities that required a great commercial fleet. French ships were few in the ports of North America. But they were more numerous than those of any other country in South America. The future of the French navy lay there. After depicting Buenos Ayres as sterile and unhealthy, he represented Monte Video as a land of production and health, and denounced the cruelties of Oribe and Rosas. Four thousand Englishmen had conquered Chiloa. Let France do as much by raising her navy estimates to five millions sterling.

M. de Rancé's amendment, however, was adopted, by a majority of 338 to 300. The first article of the project of the Government, which opened an account of 150,000f. to ensure the payment of the subsidies which had been granted to the Oriental Republic by the treaty of the 12th of June, 1848, was next adopted, as were also articles 2 and 3.

The Assembly then proceeded to vote the ensemble of the law, which was carried by 496 to 88.

The course resolved on by the Government, now that they have got a majority in favour of their views, is to send an expedition immediately to Monte Video to be composed of from 2000 to 3000 men, to support their negotiations with Rosas.

M. Dupin having been elected to again fill the President's chair in the Chamber, refused the honour, on account of his readiness to allow every new his competitors; he was a second time, however, elected, with a large majority, which satisfied his dignity, and he resumed his Presidential functions.

A good deal of discussion has occurred in the Paris journals, on the subject of the following article, which appeared in one of the numbers of a new paper just started, called the Napoleon, and which is the especial organ of the President of the Republic. The article is understood to be from the pen of Louis Napoleon himself, and is regarded as a defiance to the majority in the Chamber, who so feebly support his Ministry. It was communicated to several journals, enclosed in an envelope, bearing the seal of the office of Minister of Foreign Affairs; but that Minister denies all knowledge of it. It is as follows:—

"In consequence of the feeble majority obtained by the late measures of the Government, certain journals, whose intentions are open to doubt, advise the Ministry to retire. They pretend in arguing, on certain customs of the past, that, after such checks, Ministers who respect themselves can no longer remain in office. These journals are, we fancy to be, ignorant of what is now the position of the responsible head of the Executive Government. In the new order of things, so long as the Ministers enjoy the confidence of the President, they meet with no check. Therefore all, we repeat, that has been agreed on in the constitutional routine, that the Chief of the State will retain his Ministers in spite of jealous attacks, and that the deplorable fact of Ministerial instability will not be produced again at the will of Parliamentary coalition."

It speaks little for the prudence of the President, to thus enter the lists of newspaper warfare.

Three hundred Polish refugees, residing in Paris, have been informed that the stipend hitherto allowed will cease after the 1st of January.

The sitting of the French Academy on Tuesday was more than usually interesting. M. Guizot read a historical fragment on the restoration of the Stuarts. The Academy was much crowded.

General de Lamoricière has arrived in Paris.

A letter from Toulouse states that a duel took place between two artillerymen in garrison there on the 23rd inst. One of them received his adversary's sword through the heart, and died on the spot.

ITALIAN STATES.

From Rome we learn (via Paris) that General Baraguay d'Hilliers (the French Commander-in-Chief) and the Papal authorities are not likely to come to any friendly arrangement; General d'Hilliers insisting upon having a force of 12,000 men in the city of Rome, while the Cardinals wish to place the Pope under the protection of a mixed garrison of Austrians and Italians.

The Bishop of Rieti has been murdered at Faringa. Monsignor Moroni was the prelate who warned Count Rossi that he was to be assassinated.

There is no other news of interest from the other parts of Italy.

AUSTRIA.

By an Imperial ordonnance dated the 1st inst., the Emperor declares that the restoration of order and tranquillity admits of a reduction of the army, and divers pacific changes, preparatory to the re-establishment of affairs on a footing of peace. In this document his Majesty speaks with gratitude of the services rendered by the army during the campaign in Hungary.

From Klagenfurt we learn of the serious illness of Görgey, the late Hungarian General.

The Wanderer has letters from Shumla, stating that M. Kmety, late Hungarian General, who lately entered the service of the Porte, has been appointed to the post of Governor and Commander of the fortress of Shumla.

UNITED STATES.

Accounts which reached Liverpool on Wednesday, from New York, dated the 26th ult. have at length brought the long-expected President's Message, which was delivered on the 24th.

General Taylor recommends very strongly a revision of the tariff, and its adjustment on a basis which, by a system of specific duties, shall afford substantial and sufficient encouragement to American industry, and, at the same time, insure stabil.y.

The question of continuing the Sub-Treasury system is submitted to Congress; and, if continued, the President is of opinion that important modifications are necessary.

In the finances there is a deficiency of only sixteen million dollars this year, and the General at once recommends a loan, in addition to the debt and taxes.

With reference to the question of slavery he considers it as one to be resorted to only on very extraordinary occasions. The relations existing between the United States and other Governments are stated to be generally on a satisfactory footing. With the one exception of Mexico, which is to be considered outstanding, not even on the Nicaragua question; and the late fracas with France is treated as having been a matter of really very little importance.

The application of the people of California for admission to the Union as a sovereign state is recommended to the favourable consideration of Congress.

A reduction of letter postage to five cents, without regard to distance, is recommended. The Message concludes with some appropriate remarks on the value of the Union, and the means of preserving it. Whatever dangers may threaten it," says the President, "I shall stand by it and maintain it in its integrity, to the full extent of the obligations imposed, and the power conferred upon me by the Constitution."

Mr. Howell Cobb (Democrat) had been elected Speaker on the 22nd, by a majority of 102, against Mr. Winthrop's (Whig) 100.

General Cass had moved a suspension of intercourse with Austria.

Advices from California to the 25th November represent gold as plentiful, but the rainy season had set in. The Empire City brought half a million of dollars to New York.

On the 24th of December Sir Henry Bulwer was presented to the President. All the members of the cabinet were present. The most cordial feelings were expressed respecting the good understanding between the countries. The prevalent impression at Washington was, that the Honduras and Nicaragua affair, the only one at of which any difficulty was likely to arise, would be settled by Lord Palmerston and Mr. Clayton privately answering their agents.

The ravages of the Apaches continue in Chihuahua.

Chagres and Panama were overrun with Americans going to and returning from California.

We learn from the New York papers that a stormy discussion had taken place in the Senate respecting the admission of Father Mathew to a seat in that Assembly, which was ultimately decided in his favour by 33 to 18.

CANADA.

The public attention in Canada is still occupied with Ministerial changes. Nothing new has occurred in the annexation movement.

CALIFORNIA.

An election was held on the 10th November, to decide on the adoption of the new constitution proposed for the state, and also to vote for a governor, lieutenant-governor, two representatives, and members of the California Legislature. The constitution has been adopted almost unanimously. Great activity was prevailing at San Francisco. Buildings were going up with great rapidity.

WEST INDIES.

Advices from Jamaica to the 17th ult. state that the Legislature was still in session, and had passed a bill giving the governor a salary of £4500. A memorial to the Queen to relieve the colony of the charge had been agreed on. Another bill had been brought in to raise an additional duty on imports.

The island was rather unhealthy, and there had been many cases of fever, some of which terminated fatally.

The latest dates from Porte-au-Prince (Hayti) are to the 8th of December. Further troubles were expected at the eastern end of the island, the Dominican President Baez having issued a proclamation, under date of 17th of November, menacing the whole of the Haytien outports, which was followed by the burning and sacking of a small village called Jeromie. The Emperor was therefore making active preparations to march against St. Domingo. It was hoped, however, that the French Consul would mediate in the matter.

In Acadia the yellow fever had subsided, but not before it had proved fatal to nearly one-fifth of the garrison.

FROM WARSAW TO ST. PETERSBURG.

(By our own Correspondent.)

We will not loiter at Warsaw, though there is much to see in that ancient Polish capital. We leave it behind with its palaces, its churches, the statue of Sigmund and the memory of Sobieski.

All through Poland, both before arriving at Warsaw and after departing from it towards the Niemen, but chiefly in the former part, what principally arrests the attention is the portentous number of Jews; and Jews, too, who are many of them in a state of abject poverty. Yet, though many of them are poor, the greater number of Polish men of wealth are also of their community. Again, they here approach nearer than anywhere else to the state of territorial proprietorship. It is not that they are allowed actually to hold land in their own names and persons. But they do hold it virtually, by selling therein persons entirely in their debt and power; and then they superintend indirectly all agricultural operations, and monopolise the fruit of them directly. A singular thing it is, too, to observe how unabashed and almost ostentatious they are in displaying their quaddisty, if your readers will forgive me a dialectical term long obsolete in common parlance. This singular people is hardly anywhere more distinguished, and hardly anywhere has prone to hide itself or elude general recognition. Indeed, the Jews in Poland wear a distinctive costume, as well marked and known as a uniform could be. They do more, for, though I believe the Government taxes every Jewish beard, yet, lest even this superfluous blazon of their caste should be wanting to direct every eye, the very poorest of the Jews pay the tax sooner than not conform to the aspect of their own community. And the most timid of them put on this additional mark sooner than not brave and court inspection. The expenditure is curious in such misers—the bravado in such cowards.

From the bridge which spans the Vistula at Warsaw (one of the longest, if not the longest, of bridges in the world, two miles and a half in length) to the western archway, under which you enter Petersburg, the distance is about eight hundred English miles—about double that, in fact, between London and Edinburgh. The road, which is sufficiently straight, and perfectly level for almost its whole length, is measured at, I think, twelve hundred versts. It is covered by mail-coaches in summer, and by sledges after the snow has once covered the north-east of Europe with a thick layer—which layer lasts, indeed, full five months of the year. The sledge is infinitely the pleasanter conveyance of the two for the traveller, and, probably, for his horses too; but, as horses are not in the habit of writing travelling impressions, the latter opinion, though based on good circumstantial evidence, wants direct testimony. No man, however, who has travelled in a sledge but will agree with me, that it is very agreeable, and far smoother than a railway carriage.

Between Warsaw and Petersburgh, for the appliances of the regular mails and of incidental postage, some fourteen thousand horses, at a rough estimate, are kept along the road. If you travel by the mail, you have from four to six of these yoked to your vehicle each stage—sometimes as many as seven; and if the roads be very heavy with rains, seven eight. If you use your own carriage, you of course hire as many horses as you think fit, and as your passport may allow. The horses are small, rough-coated, and hardy animals, of light action and great speed. The coachmen are capital drivers, especially on the Russian side of the Niemen; for almost every Russian learns the management of the horse, both in the box and in the saddle, from his childhood. I have said in the saddle; but a Russian will ride a horse bare-backed, with good command and mastery, if need be. The noble beast, which he as well understands, is to that degree abundant, moreover, in the country, that its price is, in the interior, almost nothing. The transport of the animal from Petersburg to, for example, England, often costs as much. It may easily be conceived from this, what facilities the Emperor possesses for the maintenance of that countless and irresistible cavalry, which is one of the arms of his mighty host.

Suppose, then, you start from Warsaw, before the sledge season begins, and during a time of very heavy rains, you will have a right tedious journey before you, and one that may last full three days, travelling during the hours of light and dark without intermission. The Emperor, indeed, has traversed the distance in sixty hours, but then he travels as no man else does; and not only do some of the gallant Russian heads I have known of, as the effects of the furious speed which the exigences of his duties require, and which his glowing and ardent character craves, but even his very attendants (not endowed with the white heat of energy which he himself possesses) frequently drop off, one by one, to rest their aching limbs in some roadside hostelry; while he hurries on, untired, to the camp, or the council-chamber, in distant Poland.

Not pretending to such speed, and not possessing in truth the means of it at his disposal, an ordinary traveller will experience a very different rate of progression. As he proceeds, one of the first tokens of his steady advance will be the more frequent recurrence of the sweet Italian-like sound of the Russ tongue, in exchange for the harsh and guttural Polish which is the neighbourhood of Warsaw, indeed, if he have a cold in the head, let him rejoice at it, to help by its sneezes the joose but not groundless notion (a) to pronounce the necessary words which indicate his wants. If he have no cold in the head, a punch of snuff will occasionally enable him to articulate sarmatically.

A flat country, with a meagre vegetation and sluggish agriculture, the former frequently replaced by marsh and reed into rankness, and the latter wholly interrupted, by extensive fir-tree woods, conducts you in about two days to the Russian, at Kovno. This is the frontier between the old Russian provinces and the new Polish appanage. A little further down the broad and noble stream of the Niemen is the town of Tilsit, where Napoleon and Alexander met on a raft to swear an eternal friendship that lasted so very short a while. That river is associated at once with the most glorious and the most ominous fortunes of the Russian arms. The culminating splendours of the mighty conqueror's career date from it; and the proffered boundary of the Rhine, exclaiming, "What! will they take me for a Louis XIV. ?"—it is, we say, probable that the great warrior's thoughts reverted to the Niemen; which, indeed, could once passed it, he was doomed never to possess, and which, for the very same reason, he never could bear to surrender. If, in 1813, the soldiers he had left under the snows of Russia, had been still behind the Niemen, with the immense host have been marshalled against him at Leipsic, nor twice as numerous, the issue of that day might have been otherwise.

But to return. At Kovno, the monotony of the landscape is suddenly broken into scenes beautiful to behold. The banks of the river rise into ragged hills, higher on the Russian side, on which stands the old fortress of Kovno, and more on the water's edge, beyond the river. The Greek churches, with their five spires, their oblique crosses, and, above all, the novelty and strangeness of their unusual roofs, strike the eye of the traveller from the West with a peculiar charm.

While admiring the beautiful aspect of a scene full of chasms and ravines, of rocks, woods, and waters, and of the distant towers, and fortifications, and even of the sudden presence of a numerous and busy population, after the lonely and dreary influence of the country you have just traversed, a curious perplexity occurs to the mind. Between you and the opposite shore there is a gallop down to the very water's edge; and there, while your passports are being examined, you suddenly perceive that, far as the eye can sweep up and down the river (and the prospect is of considerable range in both directions), no bridge whatever—not even a bridge of boats—is to be seen. While you are musing how they mean to transport across the water your own and several other heavy vehicles, with numerous horses which you observe hard by, a vast raft is seen floating over the river. In the centre of the latter, a little way up the current, stands a small house and mast, firmly anchored, support a cable, one end of which is fastened to the raft. This cable is pulled; the raft is drawn forcibly into the middle of the stream, and, of course, with the boats and buoys (or, in other words, against the current). When the raft has arrived in line of the anchored towage in question, carriages and horses, and of the original motion is, of course, by no means spent; the cable is then suddenly loosened and the raft, under the force of the current meets the force of the transverse momentum, and the effect of the two forces is so nicely calculated, that the raft is swayed off, in an oblique direction, and arrives within half an inch of the opposite bank every trip. At that spot a pier is built. For re crossing the river, the same precise process is reversed. Thus I passed the Niemen.

On the opposite side another custom-house examination takes place. It was now about three o'clock; and, as the mail was to resume the journey onward till eight, there was plenty of time for washing, shaving, and those other refreshments of which there is no provision at all on the road, and for others, inadequate provision.

Even already, on this the very edge and threshold of Russia, there is decided improvement upon the state of things observable in Poland. An air of greater cleanliness and greater thrift prevails.

On the ground-floor of a kind of inn into which I was shown, several large and lofty rooms open into each other without doors, the spaces only for doors being there. In one of these rooms I dined; in another there was a billiard-table, at which several Russian officers of inferior rank were playing. Before I had finished my wine, a man with a guitar, a woman with a harp, and a child with limbs which she could twist into outward-of convolutions, entered and performed some music and gymnastics respectively. After this, the women went round with a plate for money; and the child, with her little hard brown palm, for money too. They were all three Germans—probably from Riga, which is of German population, though subject to the Emperor Nicholas's pleasures and goodwill. The child silently kissed the wrist of every one who gave her the expected fee.

It was now nearly eight o'clock, and I took my seat in the mail carriage.

Out of a host of Jews, who were loungers and business-seekers, one had wormed me from the moment I had alighted, and had acted as half-guide half-courier. As he spoke, however, only Russian and Polish, he was not very intelligible.

COUNTRY NEWS.

MR. COBDEN IN BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.

On Wednesday evening the County-hall in Aylesbury was crowded with an audience composed of farmers, labourers, and townspeople, to hear from Mr. Cobden his opinions on the present crisis of the national affairs.

The honourable gentleman, after some prefatory remarks, said—I stand here to maintain that, by any test that can possibly be taken the prosperity or adversity of a nation, we stand better now without the Corn-laws than we did when we had them. (No, no.) I say by every test, and I am glad to see some dissentients from that proposition here. * * * What are the tests of a national prosperity? A declining or an improving revenue is our test. Well, our revenue is better now than it was under the Corn-law. (Cheers.) Our exports and imports are better than they were under the Corn-law. (Cheers.) Then take the question of pauperism; and I won't shrink from that test of pauperism even in an agricultural district. I have the statistics of many of your unions in Buckinghamshire and Bedfordshire; and I warn the Protectionist orators, who are going about persuading themselves that they have a case in the matter of pauperism, that when Parliament meets, and Mr. Baines is enabled to bring forward his Poor-law statistics up to the last week of the year—for it won't do to give us only the accounts from the blue-books for last year—(loud cheers)—I warn the Protectionists that, in the case of pauperism, even the Aylesbury districts stand more favourably now, with bread at a moderate price, than they did in 1847, when prices were high and the loaf was nearly double its present rate. Now, take the condition of wages, which is the test of the state of the great mass of the people. What are the people earning now, compared with what they earned in 1847, when the Protectionists were so well satisfied with the high prices? As a rule, throughout the country, more money is being earned now than ever before of business than at the former period; and the working people are getting the comforts and necessaries of life in many cases at two-thirds of the prices of 1847. (A voice—"Agricultural labourers.") I will come to the Agricultural labourers by-and-by; but what I say is, that you should agree at the outset that the agricultural labourers are not the nation. (A laugh, and "They must be reckoned.") And, if agriculture be an exception to the general rule, we must find out the reason why it is so.

I say that in every branch of business the state of wages is improved. You may say agriculture is an exception; but I do not make an exception of any trade in your district—not even straw-plaiting women. (Cheers.) I have made inquiries, and I find that in the business of straw-plaiting, which is carried on extensively in Bucks and Beds, many who, in 1847, when bread was double its present price, did not earn 3s a week, now in many cases earn 20s. (A straw—a shout, "No, no," and "Yes, yes.") I know this is true, because I have it from some of the most extensive manufacturers, who are now present in this hall. (Cheers.) Then, again, the village hedger and ditcher, in which line employment I have had some of women in Bucks, and I am delighted to find the r wages also have increased since 1847, and they are getting bread two-thirds cheaper. Why, even the poor chairmaker in Wycombe—a neighbourhood—has had a share in what it is to have a revival—are becoming more busy, and their wages are improving. (Cheers.) In fact, I repeat that, without exception, there is not a trade that has not gained some advantage from the moderate price at which food is now obtained. (Cheers.) But now I want to come to a question that interests you in this immediate neighbourhood, and is it this—if every other great interest in the state is reviving, and nobody denies it, how is it that agriculture is depressed? (Cheers.) That is the great question. (Cheers.) How is it that the interests of agriculture are found in antagonism to the interests of the rest of the community? Why, it is because they have been crushed by the system—(Cheers)—they have been on an unsound basis. (Cheers.) They have been reckoning upon Act of Parliament prices, and upon those prices they have made their arrangements and calculations; but now they must, like every other trade, be content with natural prices. (Cheers.) What is the reason they cannot thrive as well as other trades? We find meetings called, purporting to be meetings of farmers, at which they complain of distress; and what are their remedies for that distress? Are they to go and talk like men of business to their landlords, and ask for fresh arrangements, in order that they may have the land—the raw material of their trade—at natural prices, and free from those absurd restrictions that prevent them from getting a proper return for that material? Do they meet to talk in that common-sense strain to their landlords? No; you never see a meeting but there is either a landlord or a landlord's agent in the chair, not talking at arm's length, but as friend and partner and fat farmers. And what do they say? They tell you, "You must go to Parliament and get again an act to raise the price of corn, in order that you may be able to pay us our rents." That is what it amounts to. But you ought to put the thing beyond the landlords and the tenants? The landlord, as Mr. Disraeli properly observed at Marlow, is an individual who has land, which is a raw material and nothing more, to dispose of. The farmer is the capitalist who has money, and who goes to the land as he may work it up and make a profit out of it. In fact, the farmer and the landowner stand in precisely the same relation to each other as the cotton spinner and the cotton merchant. The cotton spinner says to the cotton merchant, the cotton wool, from the cotton-field, in order to spin it up at a profit. If he can obtain the raw material in abundance and cheaply, he gets a profit; but if it is at a high rate, he cannot make a profit. You never hear of the cotton spinner or the cotton merchant attempting still more remarkable change in her social, moral, and intellectual aspect—to remember with what feelings of horror and repugnance that colony was a few years since regarded by all classes of England; and to consider what numbers of men of the highest character and intelligence now resorted to it, and the talent they brought to bear on every question in their Assembly. Dr Featherston concluded by saying, that the course they had uniformly pursued in regard to this question—the presence of so many at that Banquet—the petition having received the signatures of more than nine-tenths of the whole male adult population—afforded sufficient proof that their zeal in the good cause had not abated, and that they were more determined than ever not to relax in their present exertions until they had conferred representative institutions upon this, their adopted country. The speaker was loudly cheered throughout his address, and sat down amidst protracted applause

Mr. Vincent then, in a speech wherein he strongly attacked the Government, proposed "The healths of the gentlemen who declined seats in the Nominee Council;" viz W. Fox, Esq., J.P., Principal Agent of the New Zealand Company; A. M'Donald, Esq., J.P., Dr. Featherston; Captain Daniells, J.P.; J. Johnston, Esq.; K. Bethune, Esq.; and F. A. Weld, J.P., Esq. The toast was drunk with musical honours. Dr Featherston replied.

Mr. Fox next proposed "The Education of all classes," which was heartily responded to. Mr. J. Wade gave "The Liberty of the Press;" and Mr. Brandon, "Auckland, and the Sister Settlements." Mr. W. Dorset then proposed "The health of Sir William Molesworth, and success to the Petition entrusted to his charge;" which was drunk with enthusiasm. The next toast, "Earl Grey and her Majesty's Ministers," was given by Mr Kitham, and drunk most cordially. This was followed by "The New Zealand Company," and a variety of other toasts associated with the interests of the colony, and the party did not break up until a late hour.

The accompanying Illustration is from a Sketch taken by Mr. Marriott, whose artistic skill in the decoration of the theatre we have already mentioned.

PROTECTIONIST MEETING AT LINCOLN.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

HOMERIC TABLE (THE SHIELD OF ACHILLES).—DESIGNED BY JOHN HENNING, JUN., ESQ., FOR THE GALLERY OF THE RIGHT HON. LORD NORTHWICK.

THE GREAT SEAL OF CALIFORNIA.

We are enabled by the courtesy of a Correspondent to present our readers with the accompanying authentic representation of the Great Seal of the State of California, as adopted by the Convention held at San Francisco on the 5th of October last. It was designed by Major R. S. Garnett, of the United States army. It seems that each region wished to be represented in the Seal. The Sacramento district wanted a gold mine, with a miner at work; San Francisco, its harbour and shipping: the Sonoma members thought no seal would be complete without something from their ancient "bear-flag;" whilst those from Los Angeles and San Diego were clamorous for their corn, vines, and olives. These several requirements have been met, as far as possible, in the accompanying design.

Around the bevel of the ring are represented thirty-one stars, being the number of the states of which the Union will consist, upon the admission of California. The foreground figure represents the goddess Minerva, having sprung full-grown from the brain of Jupiter. She is introduced as a type of the political birth of California, without having gone through the probation of a territory. At her feet crouches a grisly bear, feeding upon clusters from a grape-vine, which, with a sheaf of wheat, are emblematic of the peculiar characteristics of the country. A miner is engaged at work, with a rocker and bowl at his side, illustrating the golden wealth of the Sacramento, upon whose waters are seen shipping, typical of commercial greatness; and the snow-clad peaks of the Sierra Nevada make up the background. Above, is the Greek motto, "Eureka" (I have found it), applying either to the principle involved in the admission of the State, or the success of the miners at work.

The Engraving is of the actual size of the Seal.

We would recommend the Californian Government to use gutta percha in place of sealing-wax. This has been employed for the new Great Seal of Ireland, and found to succeed admirably.

THE SEA-SERPENT.—Extract from a letter, dated "H.M.S. Cleopatra, Singapore, Oct. 26, 1849," from an officer of that ship:—"Sept. 15. This evening they reported the sea-serpent: several of the men, as well as the officer of the forecastle, saw the monster; and they all ran aft to see it from the stern: they say it was about thirty feet long. After the report, all hands came on deck; but the evening was fast drawing to a close, and the ship going at eight knots, soon left the monster astern, going through the water very quickly to the N.W."—(From a Correspondent.)

HOMERIC TABLE.

THIS exquisite work has been designed and executed by Mr. John Henning, jun., for the Right Hon. Lord Northwick, a munificent patron of art; and will shortly be deposited in his Lordship's Gallery, at Thirlestaine House, Cheltenham.

The design of the sculpture, in the portion of the Table here engraved, is to illustrate Homer's description of the Shield of Achilles (Vide Pope's Translation of the "Iliad," book xviii., lines 501 to 704). This circular top is four feet in diameter, and is supported by a palm-tree springing from a tripod base, on which are grouped figures of Achilles, Brisels, Thetis, and a Triton, attended by genii upon the backs of dolphins. This supporting group is beautifully executed in carton-pierre, of the new white of zinc, portions of the base and the palm-tree being relieved with gold, as is also the encircling framework of the Table.

The Shield is beautifully executed in sepia; and the "godlike labours" of "the threefold circle" are admirably drawn.

> There earth, there heaven, there ocean he design'd;
> The unwearied sun, the moon completely round:
> The starry lights that heaven's high convex crown'd;
> The Pleiads, Hyads, with the northern beam,
> And great Orion's more refulgent beam;
> To which, around the axis of the sky,
> The Bear revolving points his golden eye,
> Still shines exalted on the ethereal plain,
> Nor bathes his blazing forehead in the main.
> Two cities radiant on the shield appear,
> The image one of peace, and one of war.

Here we have portrayed the sacred pomp, the genial feast, the solemn dance, and hymeneal rite; the debate in the forum, and the judgment of elders: war, with its horrors of siege, and slaughter, and spoil; contrasted with peaceful industry, and waving fields, and ponderous harvest of vines. Next is the incident of the master bull seized by the lions.

> A figured dance succeeds, such once was seen
> In lofty Gnossus, for the Cretan queen,
> Form'd by Daedalean art: a comely band
> Of youths and maidens, bounding hand in hand:
> The maids in soft almars of linen dress'd;
> The youths all graceful in the glossy vest:
> Of those the locks with flowery wreaths inroll'd;
> Of these the sides adorn'd with swords of gold,
> That glittering gay, from silver belts depend.

These are followed by the games—and so the sprightly revel ends:—

> Thus the broad shield complete the artist crown'd
> With his last hand, and pour'd the ocean round.
> In living silver seem'd the waves to roll,
> And beat the border'd verge, and bound the whole.

The drawing is covered with plate-glass, and has been elegantly mounted as a table, by Mr. J. Morris, of 79, Park-street, Grosvenor-square. It will be exhibited for a few days, after the 14th instant, at Messrs. Hering and Remington's, the print publishers, 137, Regent-street.

CHRONOMETERS.—The Admiralty have just received from Sir James Ross the journals of chronometer rates kept on board the vessels in the last Arctic Expedition, from which it appears that, altogether, fifteen Government chronometers were employed, eight being used in the Enterprise, and seven in the Investigator. They were rated by comparison every day throughout the voyage, and their performance regularly noted down. The chronometers selected as the standards, after trials on the voyage, were both of Lasely's mercurial construction, viz., 113 in the Enterprise, and 119 in the Investigator, and were those chiefly used in navigating the ships home. Notwithstanding the low and variable climate to which the chronometers were exposed, and the shocks the vessels received from the ice, these steadily maintained their rate; and, on reaching England, were found to have indicated the longitude with great precision. The Admiralty have, therefore, given instructions for two others on the same principle to be among those furnished to the present Expedition.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—By our American advices this week, we learn that her Majesty's ship Herald had arrived at Mazatlan on the 12th ult., after proceeding as far as latitude 73 10, without hearing tidings of Sir John Franklin: she left the Plover man-of-war to winter in Behring's Straits. The Plover's boats had been sent up the Mackenzie river in search of Sir John Franklin. The boats were to winter at the nearest station. The impression of the commander of the Herald is, that Sir John Franklin was safe; but we have not the data on which that impression is founded. The yacht Nancy Dawson, also at Mazatlan, accompanied the Herald in its dangerous voyage. The owner of the yacht was on a tour of the world, and falling in company with the Herald, determined to go in search of Sir John Franklin. Since the arrival of the yacht at Mazatlan its owner had died. The yacht, brought in charge of a sailing-master from the man-of-war, would be sent by the British Consul to England.

A young Chinese from Nankin, named Lo, arrived a few days since at Nantes. On landing he went to the house of the Bishop, who received him with the greatest kindness. This young man, who is twenty-two years of age, belongs to a family who have professed the Catholic religion for the last six generations. One of its members is now acting as a missionary in his native country. This young Lo speaks Latin with the greatest fluency. He is about to proceed to Naples, to enter the college of the Propaganda, where eight of his countrymen are already established.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

ON Wednesday, the British Museum was opened to the public, after the customary cleaning. Throughout the day, the attendance of visitors was very numerous; and we were gratified to find the Nineveh Sculptures very attractive, notwithstanding their present inconvenient temporary location, in the basement of the building, where, whatever may be the lack of light, there is a tolerable supply of heat.

The subject here engraved is a novel addition to the classic antiquities in the Museum. It is a small Etruscan Sarcophagus, in terra cotta, recently presented by the Marquis of Northampton, and placed on the south side of the Great Central Saloon, under the colossal head of Rameses. The Sarcophagus is richly decorated in colours, and is a very interesting contribution to the stores of Etruscan art already possessed by the Museum.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. X. Y. Z.—Some writers (Milton among them) have denied that such a person as Arthur, the British chief, ever existed. Of this, however, there seems no more reason to doubt, than of the existence of Hengist, Cerdic, or any other man of note of that time.
A. C. Apply to the Secretary to the General Lying-in Hospital, York-road, Lambeth.
M. J. Liverpool.—We do not know who can give you the information you require.
A CHRISTIAN SUBSCRIBER WISHES.—The Rev. Dr. Richardson's English Dictionary is 10s 6d; the Rev. J. Pye Smith's Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, in the Government, 6s; a List of whom any particular Books is the property of, can be found in the Catalogue of Books printed in our Journal previous to Mr. Hood's death, May 3, 1845.
A. THE LADIES, Dulwich.—The "Novels and Tales" are engraved by Harding.
L. L. D.—Write on one side only, for expedition sake. The quotation should be given.
ACHILLES.—The Court morning will cease on the 20th.
YORKSHIREMAN, Hull, Sheffield, respecting the magic lantern, to Horne and Co., 13, Newgate-street.
R. L. N. Manchester.—Relief in money will be preferable.
RESIDENTS should consult the work "Student Life in Germany."
FRANCAIS, Liverpool.—We prefer a scrap-book.
T. L., Old Windsor.—Thorwaldsen's statue of Lord Byron is in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge.
A STUDENT.—We have not room for the "Compliments of the Season."
T. M.—See the Memoir of Kossuth in No. 359 of our Journal; and in the Athenæum, No. 1139.
A SUBSCRIBER, Stratford.—Write to Messrs. Longman and Co., Paternoster-row.
CLERICUS HIBERNICUS.—We can discover no arms for the name in question. In marshalling quarterings, the first followed the paternal coat; the second, that of the heiress, and then each in case any quarterings her descent may bring in; with the second heiress, the same rule is followed, and so on, in chronological rotation, with every heiress from whom the bearer may derive.
S. M. S. Windsor.—An illegitimate child may take any name he pleases. Property must be left to him in the name that will identify him.
HELENA.—The word Dowager is generally confined to persons of hereditary title, and borne by the widow of a deceased nobleman or Baronet.
I. M.—The arms of the family of Mathew are—"Or, a lion rampant, az." "Garnished" in heraldry means ornamented.
None but the descendants of C would be entitled to the arms granted to him. Mottoes may be adopted or changed at pleasure.
A CORRESPONDENT.—The eldest daughter of the eldest son is entitled to the designation of Miss.
M. F. M.—We do not know the nobleman's name.
ALPHOS.—The unmarried daughter of a Baronet takes precedence of married ladies of inferior rank.
W. H.—Both of the many officers are entitled to put cockades in their servants' hats. Militia officers, however, have no such privilege.
A SUBSCRIBER.—Under no circumstance can a lady bear a crest. A widow, on marrying a second time, drops altogether her husband's arms.
AN INQUIRER.—Charles Earl of Whitworth died 19th May, 1825.
A BLACK-LODGE.—When family of Wyvern does our Correspondent refer to?
GENEALOGIST.—The Heralds' Visitations are preserved in the library of the British Museum, and at the Heralds' Office. They are all important to the genealogical inquirer, and are accepted as proof in a court of law. Their contents include the pedigrees and arms of the various county families extant at the date of each visitation.
DALIA.—Mary Grimaldi, Esq. de jure Grimaldi, is a descendant of the Princes of Monaco. New families are rarer illustrious.
7 7.—Strictly speaking, we deem our Correspondent correct; but general custom permits the usage of the sacrificium even during the lifetime of the lady's father.
B.—The arms of her husband are impaled with her own, without crest or motto.
H. E. E.—Edward VI bore the motto, "Dieu et mon droit."
D. L.—The crest engraved on the seal in your possession would possibly render your labits to the task.
S.—By applying to Dr Chevens, 8, Connaught-place West, Hyde Park, will readily obtain the information required upon the Air-Syphon.
AN OLD SUBSCRIBER, Plymouth.—The great of James I is very common.
S. B.—We do not know any work of the kind that can be relied on.
A REGULAR SUBSCRIBER.—The price of Leech's "Young Troublesome" is 5s 6d; 7s 6d coloured. Of Doyle's "Mr Pips his Diary," 6s.
A B. Newchurch.—Pall-mall was the first street in London lighted with gas, this being in 1807.
C. H. T. Dalwich.—The first half of the present century will end on December 31, 1850.
G. G. A. Edinburgh.—We do not remember to have seen the work you refer to.
ESTARA (Sarah).—Be all the above correct.
F. J. H.—Certainly not.
CANTUS has been redistributed.
L. T. HAMILTON.—We cannot advise you.
AN ENGLISHWOMAN, Hastings.—Received.
J. R. F. Hull.—Snipes are game.
DEUTSCH.—Apply at the office.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 12, 1850.

THE annual Message of the President of the United States is always a document of much interest. More than ordinary curiosity has been felt, both in America and in Europe, to see the first Message of President Taylor—the conqueror of Mexico—the "rough and ready" soldier, and plain man of business. The document has at length arrived, and will confirm the reputation for bluntness and honesty which the President has acquired, and favourably impress the European world with his talents and his character. General Taylor, a Whig and a Protectionist, has manifested an inclination for Free-Trade almost as strong and decided as was manifested by Sir Robert Peel in his famous reform of the Tariff; and the only allusions to the subject, which he has permitted himself in the Message, give reason for the belief that his opinions are rapidly settling against Protection. He congratulates the United States on the repeal of our Navigation Laws, and anticipates great benefits to both countries from the change. He also declares himself, though in moderate and guarded language, in favour of a revenue tariff. The approaching debates in Congress will show the strength of parties on this important subject. General Taylor prudently gives the go-by to the irritating and embarrassing question of Slavery—the Nemesis of the Union, who pursues it in good fortune and in bad, and who sits, like the Ghost of Banquo, at all her banquets. The Conqueror of Mexico has not forgotten to present his bill for that achievement. A deficit of sixteen millions of dollars, extending over the two financial years ending on the 1st of July, 1851, is the estimated cost of the indulgence of the Union in the Old-World custom of making war upon an unoffending neighbour. The President proposes to meet the deficiency by a loan—a ruinous expedient—which, with the example of Great Britain, France, and all the States of Europe to warn them, the United States would have shown wisdom in avoiding.

Upon foreign politics, the Message is, upon the whole, satisfactory. The President, it is true, goes out of his way to express his sympathy with the Magyars, and his regret that their attempt at revolution was not successful—a proceeding quite as unnecessary, not to say impertinent, as if the Emperor of Austria were to address his Constitutional Parliament, and express his sorrow that the Abolition party in the American Union had not succeeded in putting an end to the crime of slave-holding. With this exception, the Message contains nothing that can give offence to foreign powers. On the contrary, its language is diplomatic and conciliatory. Upon the attempt said to be in contemplation by a buccaneering party to invade the island of Cuba, with a view to its forcible annexation to the Union, as a counter-weight in the slavery interest to the annexation of the free State of California, the President expresses himself determined to execute the law of the United States against any such nefarious scheme, and to maintain inviolate the faith of treaties. Upon the Mosquitia question—which affects all the civilised world in its bearing upon the intercommunication of Europe with the extreme west of America, but in which England is more peculiarly interested, on account of the protectorate claimed by Lord Palmerston, on behalf of the British Government, over the states of the Mosquitian King—the President speaks the language of common sense. The following extract places the matter succinctly before the world:—

> A contract having been concluded with the State of Nicaragua, by a company composed of American citizens, for the purpose of constructing a ship canal through the territory of that State, to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, we have directed the negotiation of a treaty with Nicaragua, pledging both governments to protect those who shall engage in and perfect the work. All other nations are invited by the Senate of Nicaragua to enter into the treaty upon stipulations with her; and the benefit to be derived by each from such an arrangement will be the protection of this great inter-oceanic communication against any power which might seek or desire to monopolize its advantages. All States entering into such a treaty will enjoy the right of passage through the canal on payment of the same tolls. The work, if constructed under these guarantees, will become a bond of peace, instead of a subject of dissension and strife between the nations of the earth. Should the great maritime States of Europe consent to this arrangement (and we have no reason to suppose that a proposition so fair and honorable will be opposed by any), the strength as of their people and ours will co-operate in promoting the success of the enterprise.

Whatever the particular claims of the King of Mosquitia may be—and we confess our inability to comprehend exactly the case put forward for him by the British Government—they cannot be of such a nature as to prevent the construction of a great work essentially necessary to the commerce of the whole civilized world. We cannot believe that any real impediment will arise, or that the maritime states of Europe will not consent to the arrangement with Nicaragua in which the Government of the United States has taken the initiative.

THE REVENUE.

The official return of revenue for the quarter which terminated on Saturday last shows that, compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, there is an increase of £371,129, being the balance arising on the aggregate of the various items enumerated below:—

	INCREASE.
Customs		£38,235
Excise		871,899
Stamps		37,252
Property Tax		24,960
Crown Lands		30,000
Miscellaneous		36,909
Increase on ordinary Revenue		£539,955
Imprest and other Moneys		1,192
Gross Increase on Revenue		£540,247
	DECREASE.
Taxes	£23,052
Post-office	46,000
Decrease on ordinary Revenue	£69,052
China Money	84,284
Repayment of Advances	15,786
	169,122
Net Increase		£371,129

It should, however, be stated, that, notwithstanding the increase on the quarter, the account for the whole year, ending on the 5th of January, 1850, as compared with the year which closed on the 5th of January, 1849, is not so favourable: it presents a net decrease of £80,181.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.

(From the Gazette of Tuesday.)

BY THE QUEEN. PROCLAMATION.

Victoria R.—Whereas our Parliament stands prorogued to Wednesday, the 16th day of this instant January, we, with the advice of our Privy Council, do hereby publish and declare, that the said Parliament shall be further prorogued, on the said 16th day of January Instant, to Thursday, the 31st day of January Instant; and we have given order to our Chancellor of that part of our United Kingdom called Great Britain to prepare a commission for proroguing the same accordingly. And we do hereby further, with the advice aforesaid, declare our Royal will and pleasure that the said Parliament shall, on the said Thursday, the 31st day of January Instant, assemble and be holden for the despatch of divers urgent and important affairs; and the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the knights, citizens, and burgesses, and the commissioners for shires and burghs of the House of Commons, are hereby required and commanded to give their attendance accordingly, at Westminster, on the said Thursday, the 31st day of January Instant.

Given at our Court, at Windsor, this 8th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1850, and in the thirteenth year of our reign.

God save the Queen.

ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—We are informed that, should the next West India Mail not bring any intelligence from Dr. Rae respecting the expedition under Sir J. Franklin, another expedition will be prepared immediately.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR.

The Royal hospitalities of the past week have been confined to a very small circle of visitors, among whom may be mentioned the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, the Duke d'Aumale, the Prince de Joinville, the Marquis de Brecablanc, the Bishop of Manchester, Sir George Scovell, and the Rev. James Cartmell.

On Saturday last his Royal Highness Prince Albert went out hunting, accompanied by the Duke de Nemours, and attended by Lord Charles Fitzroy and Colonel F. H. Seymour.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service on Sunday morning in the Private Chapel. The Bishop of Manchester preached the sermon, the prayers being read by the Hon. and Rev. G. Wellesley.

On Monday the Prince Consort enjoyed the sport of shooting. His Royal Highness was accompanied by the Duke de Nemours, the Prince de Joinville, and the Duke d'Aumale, and attended by Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, Colonel Berkeley Drummond, and Colonel F. H. Seymour. The Duke and Duchess de Nemours, and the other Princes of the ex-Royal family of France, left the Castle on Monday.

On Tuesday morning her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert drove out, attended by the Maids of Honour in Waiting and the Equerries in Waiting, Lord Charles Fitzroy and Colonel Seymour. The Earl of Liverpool, Sir George Scovell, and the Rev. James Carlmell, arrived the Castle on Tuesday.

On Wednesday her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and attended by the Marchioness of Douro, Hon. Miss Lennox, Lord Charles Fitzroy, and Colonel F. H. Seymour, drove to Frogmore, where his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the gentlemen in attendance, enjoyed the diversion of shooting on the ornamental water. The Queen and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent were present.

On Wednesday afternoon an address of condolence on the death of her late Majesty the Queen Dowager, from the University of Cambridge, was presented to her Majesty. The audience given for that purpose, by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Chancellor, and the Rev. James Cartmell, Master of Christ's College, Vice-Chancellor of the University.

On Thursday the Queen and Prince Albert dined with the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore House. The Marquis of Breadalbane and the Earl of Liverpool had the honour of joining the Royal party. The Duchess of Kent had afterwards an evening party.

The youthful members of the Royal Family have enjoyed their usual airings daily. Their Royal Highnesses continue in the enjoyment of excellent health.

The Earl of Listowel has relieved Lord Elphinstone in the duties of Lord in Waiting to the Queen; and Col. the Hon. R. Boyle has relieved Col. Berkeley Drummond in the duties of Groom in Waiting to her Majesty.

The Hon. Miss Cavendish and the Hon. Miss Kerr have relieved the Hon. Miss Murray and the Hon. Miss Lennox, in their duties as Maids of Honour in Waiting on the Queen.

THE QUEEN'S COURT, ETC.

On Tuesday last the Queen held a Court and Privy Council at Windsor Castle. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Marquis of Lansdowne (Lord President), Sir George Grey (Secretary of State for the Home Department), the Earl Grey (Secretary of State for the Colonial Department), the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere (President of the Board of Trade), the Marquis of Breadalbane (Lord Chamberlain), and the Duke of Norfolk (Master of the Horse).

At the Council, Parliament was ordered to be further prorogued from Wednesday, the 16th of January, until Thursday, the 31st of January; and a proclamation was ordered to be issued, summoning Parliament to meet on the said 31st of January for the despatch of business.

Her Majesty afterwards held a Court, at which the Right Rev. Dr. Hinds had an audience of the Queen in the Royal closet, and did homage on being appointed Bishop of Norwich. The Bishop of Norwich, the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cottenham), and Sir George Grey (her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Home Department), assisted at the ceremony. The Right Rev. Dr. Oliphant had an audience of her Majesty, and did homage on being appointed Bishop of Llandaff. The Bishop of Chester and Sir George Grey assisted at the ceremony.

After attending the Court, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Earl Grey, the Bishop of Chester, the Bishop of Norwich, Lord Cottenham, Sir George Grey, the Marquis of Breadalbane, and the Hon. William Bathurst, left Windsor by a special train on the Great Western Railway, and returned to the Paddington terminus. The Right Hon. H. Labouchere left Windsor for Stoke, and the Duke of Norfolk also took his departure from the Castle.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent will, it is stated, occupy Abergeldie Castle, on the banks of the Dee, during next autumn. This picturesque castle is in the neighbourhood of Balmoral.

His Royal Highness Prince George, accompanied by Capt. the Hon. James Bathurst, R.N., left town on Wednesday, for Dean Park, near Kettering, on a visit to the Earl of Cardigan.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Worcester are passing the festive season at Badminton.

We much regret to have to announce the death, at Vienna, on the 15th ult., of the Comtesse de Maltzan, after a protracted illness. The deceased will long be remembered, by those who knew her, as an ornament to society, as well as for her many amiable and kind qualities. She was aunt by marriage to the present Baroness Meyer de Rothschild.

The Earl and Countess of Hardwicke have arrived at Leghorn, en route for England.

The friends of Viscount Seaham will be gratified to learn that his Lordship's and and fatal accident has not interfered with his general health. The inflammatory action in the vessels of the eye is subsiding; and, although his Lordship suffers much pain and uneasiness, he bears up with the utmost patience and fortitude against his sad calamity.

Viscount Canterbury and Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence have joined the circle assembled on a visit to the Earl of Cardigan, at Deane Park.

Sir George Grey left town on Wednesday afternoon, on a visit to the Duke of Bedford, at Woburn Abbey, Bedfordshire.

Lord John Russell will give the first Cabinet dinner this season on Wednesday next, at his residence in Chesham-place; and on the following evening a grand entertainment will be given by his Lordship to the leading members of the corps diplomatique.

We understand that a marriage is shortly to take place between Lord Osseleton, M.P., son of the Earl of Tankerville, and Lady Olivia Montagu, only daughter of the Duke of Manchester. Lady Olivia is in her 20th year. A marriage is also said to be arranged between the Hon. and Rev. Frederick Pomsonby, second son of the late, and brother of the present, Earl of Bessborough, and the Lady Louisa Eliot, only daughter of the Earl and Countess of St. Germans.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—The nuptials of the Hon. Sarah Elizabeth Copley, eldest daughter of Lord Lyndhurst, and Mr. Henry John Selwin, only son of Mr. John Selwin, of Down Hall, Essex, were celebrated on Tuesday last, at St. George's Church, Hanover-square. After the performance of the religious rite the relatives and friends of both families, present to witness the ceremony, were assembled to a sumptuous déjeûner at Lord Lyndhurst, in George-street, where a déjeûner was given by Lady Lyndhurst to celebrate the event. The bride, who was attended to the altar by her sisters, the Hon. Sophia and Georgiana Copley, and Misses Mary and Agnes Selwin, was attired in a costume composed of a robe of rich white glacé, flounced with costly Brussels point lace, and a veil of the same rich material. Shortly before three o'clock the newly-married pair, after taking leave of their assembled relatives, left town for Dawlish, in the county of Devon, where they will pass the honeymoon.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH THE CONTINENT.—The postal committee of the Boulogne and Amiens Railway Company, who are endeavouring to obtain an alteration of the present route of the mail with France, by which the receipt and despatch of correspondence will not only suit the Continent, but with China and India, would be very materially facilitated, have prepared the following memorial to the Premier, which is now in course of signature in all the principal manufacturing districts of the kingdom:—"The memorial of the undersigned merchants, bankers, and others of ——, humbly sheweth.—That the present postal communication between England and France does not offer those facilities which the increase of the two countries require. That the mail service via Dover and Calais is performed with much unnecessary delay, and conveyed by a circuitous and expensive route, to the great detriment of commerce and international communication. That, by the substitution of the more direct and less expensive route via Folkestone and Boulogne, letters posted in Paris in the evening would reach London in time for the first morning delivery, and in time, also, for the early morning mails to the north and west of England. That the delay caused by the present postal service between the two countries affects not only the correspondence between London and Paris, but the mails from India and China, and thereby occasions much inconvenience to the general trade and commerce of the country. That the service between Folkestone and Boulogne could be performed with certainty and regularity, except during the prevalence of south-west gales of wind, for about one hour per day; and Boulogne is accessible for not more than twenty times in the year, when the mails might be landed at Calais, and carried by special conveyance to Boulogne. That even under such circumstances the mails would be conveyed in the same time and be delivered at the same hour as at present viâ Dover and Calais, where there is an insurmountable fixed and regular delay occasioned by the additional length of 66½ miles of road, and that the present failures in the service which are not unfrequently occur during north-east gales of wind, when Calais is inaccessible, would entirely cease. That your memorialists, therefore, pray that, for the interests of commerce, and the promotion of amity and intercourse between the two countries, the mail service may be transferred to the direct and natural highway between London and Paris, viâ Folkestone and Boulogne. And your memorialists will ever pray, &c."

PIRACY IN BORNEO.—We understand that the Peace Society and the Aborigines' Protection Society intend to take up the subject of Sir James Brooke's recent exploits in the Eastern Archipelago; and a public meeting is to be held on the subject just before the opening of Parliament.

NATIONAL REFORM.

The spirit of movement which at present agitates the rural and agricultural community for the purpose of obtaining "Protection" from the Legislature, is equally active amongst the town populations for the accomplishment of a very different object, viz. "Parliamentary and Financial Reform." We subjoin the report of a meeting this week of the association which was organised some time back, with this latter object in view. The proceedings pointedly show the direction in which the undercurrents of opinion are at present running in the great tide of politics with such active power and force.

A special meeting of the members of the National Reform Association was held at the London Tavern, on Monday; Sir Joshua Walmsley, M.P., in the Presidentcy, in the chair. Among those upon the platform were Mr. H. Tindal Atkinson (hon. secretary), Mr. G. W. M. Reynolds; Mr. Feargus O'Connor M.P.; Mr. Arthur Anderson, M.P.; Mr. Brodie M'Ghie Willcox, M.P.; the Rev. Robert Thomas Spencer, A.M., and the Revs. Thomas Binney, John Burnet, and Eustace Carey (Dissenting Ministers), Mr. Under-Sheriff Wire, Mr. Miall, &c. The body of the room was densely crowded

Mr. H. Tindal Atkinson, the hon. secretary, read the financial statement for the past nine months, from which it appeared that the receipts had been £1080 7s.; and the expenditure, £1869 17s.; leaving a balance of £110 10s.

Amongst the letters of apology for inability to attend, was the following from Mr. Cobden:—

153, Westbourne-terrace, Jan 7, 1850.

My dear Walmsley,—I have been confined to the house for a couple of days with a cold and am sorry I can't be at your meeting. I am engaged to appear in Buckinghamshire on Wednesday next, and unless I am more cured as to be well enough to go, the Protectionists will say I am afraid.

By the way, what better proof could be had of the necessity of an alteration of our representative system than is to be found in the simple fact that the Protectionist party are claiming to have public opinion on their side in favour of a revival of the Corn-law. They tell us to look at the majorities in the elections for Kidderminster and Reading, where a few hundred men, more or less under influence, returned Protectionists. Now, I would ask, how many more than a few would they return in favour of a bread-tax, if the constituencies consulted, or they ought to do, 10,000 voters at least? The necessity of placing the House of Commons more under the influence of the people few will deny; the only question is, how to accomplish it. I can only say that whether it be attempted by a direct vote of the House of Commons, or by as many as possible of the people arming themselves with the 40s. freehold franchise, whatever plan may be resorted to it shall continue to have my hearty support. All I ask of the public is, not to delude themselves with the idea that a few Liberal members of the house can accomplish anything without the co-operation of the great majority of the people out of doors, and remain, very truly yours,

RICHARD COBDEN

Sir Joshua Walmsley, M.P., Fallowfield Rooms, Stamford-hill, Jan. 8, 1850.

The Chairman reported the progress of the movement, and indicated the tactics for the ensuing year. He said that nine months ago he had presided over a meeting in that room, to celebrate the birth of the association, and now he had to congratulate them upon their onward progress. A few months after the first meeting, a large public meeting had been held in Drury-lane Theatre, when the feeling for reform appeared so universal that it was thought wise to change the name from Metropolitan to National, and subsequent events had proved that they had only anticipated the wants and wishes of the country. (Hear, hear.) Meetings had also been held at Northampton, Norwich, Newcastle-on-Tyne, North and South Shields, Sunderland, Perth, Aberdeen, Greenock, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dentlyne, Wrexham, Southampton, and Bristol, in addition, to numerous others which had been held in and around the metropolis. (Cheers.) In all these places branch societies had been formed; the friends of improved representation were ripe for action, and were on the point of organising for active and vigorous agitation. A short time since a conference of the tried friends of the association had been held, and three things had been unanimously agreed upon

1. That a fund of no less than £10,000 be raised to be devoted during the year to the purpose of the association.

2. That immediate measures be taken to arouse simultaneous meetings throughout the entire country.

3. That a conference be convened in London in March next.

Of the ability of the country to carry out the second of these propositions there could be no doubt if the first were to be realised. This would be practicable there was no cause for fear. The council had itself set an example of liberality, and the present meeting had been called as a committee of ways and means. A similar appeal would be made to the second city in the empire—Dublin—that of the subscriptions would be read, and those present would be invited to swell that list, and it would be known to the world to-morrow that the City of London, which was formerly in every great national philanthropic and commercial enterprise, was also foremost in the movement for representative regeneration. (Cheers.) The speaker then proceeded to describe all the elements of discontent existing in the country as elements in the strength of the movement, which, properly directed, would be so powerful that no Ministry or Parliament would be able to resist it. Amongst the most powerful of these aids would be their fellow-subjects in the colonies, as intelligent, as virtuous, and as commercial, enterprise, was also foremost in the movement for representative regeneration. (Cheers.) The speaker then proceeded to describe all the elements of discontent existing in the country as elements in the strength of the movement, which, properly directed, would be so powerful that no Ministry or Parliament would be able to resist it. Amongst the most powerful of these aids would be their fellow-subjects in the colonies, as intelligent, as virtuous, and as commercial, as with the present system as themselves. (Great cheering, which lasted several minutes.) The colonists were the victims of every rhetor who might hold the reins of power at the Colonial-office; they were made to pay hundreds only for the pay-day paupers of Corfu—(Continued and applause) and maintained only for the benefit of an idle tax-devouring aristocracy—(Cheers)—and foul and worthless officials. The colonists would see that in a redemption of the people at home the first step to their own salvation lay. (Cheers.) They would see an enlightened system of self-government, and relief from the present tyrannous misgovernment from which they suffered. They were unrepresented in the House of Commons—(Cheers)—and that House, in fact, was not a representation of the people. (Loud cheers). It represented only class interests, those of the aristocracy and those who profited by corruption being prepotent. (Cheers.)

The chairman then called upon the hon. secretary to read the resolutions agreed to at a meeting held at the association on the 20th of December, which would put the meeting in possession of what was proposed to be done. They were as follows:—

That, as the recent demonstrations throughout the country justify the conclusion that the nation is strongly in favour of the principles of this association, it is the opinion of the council of the same that the feeling which unquestionably prevails, and that this should be done as speedily as possible, so as to produce a timely influence on the proceedings of Parliament.

That it is necessary, as a preliminary measure, to extend the organisation to every town in the kingdom, by forming local committees of active members of the council, for the purpose of the delivery of lectures, and the holding of public meetings That to arrange this organisation, and thus unite the friends of reform to active and simultaneous action, this meeting recommends to the council that the kingdom should be divided into districts, and gentlemen be deputed from each district to meet the council at stated periods, superintend, according to special instructions, the necessary organisation, and report from day to day to the council

That the council be requested to consider the most means and to report at an appropriate time to promote the separation of public meetings, by embodying in a petition the principles of the association.

That, for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the association, an appeal be made to the reformers of the country at large, to raise a sum of at least £10,000 for the year 1850.

That it be a recommendation to the council to canvass a considerable number of persons, selected by committees or public meetings of reformers in all parts of the kingdom, to be holden in London, at any time during the month of March next, and that the council at their next consideration pledge themselves to use their best exertions to advance the question, and to insure the success of the principles of the association.

The first resolution was agreed to nem. con., viz.

That this meeting, convinced of the necessity of a general agitation of the United Kingdom on the question of parliamentary and financial reform, with a view to an early and universal expression of public opinion on that subject, would record its cordial and unanimous approval of the plans proposed by the Council of the National Association for that purpose, and pledges itself to render immediate and efficient co-operation.

Mr. Feargus O'Connor having delivered a characteristic speech against Protection, and in favour of enlarged political reform,

The hon. secretary read a list of subscriptions, amongst which were S. Morley, £50; William Johnson, £50, R. Cobden, M.P., £10; A. Anderson, M.P., £50; W. Leefe, £50; Admiral Biggins, £50; S. Barr, £20; T. Prout, £50; W. Williams (ex-M.P. for Coventry), £50; Sir James Duke, M.P., £50; Thomas Wilcox, M.P., £50; G. Thompson, M.P., £10; H. Tindal Atkinson, £10; G. W. M. Reynolds, £10, G. M. Whitty, £10; D. W. Wire, £50; Sir Joshua Walmsley, £50; the Norwich Branch, £100, &c.

The second resolution stated

That this meeting earnestly recommends to the friends of Parliamentary reform, throughout Great Britain and the colonies, to furnish prompt and liberal assistance to the council of the National Association, by the holding of public meetings, the enrolling of members, the formation of committees, the employment of local agents, and the contribution of funds

Mr. Miall seconded it. He was a practical man, and had an idea was, that 200 men of business, and of independent means, friends of the people, and ready to sacrifice their time and their energies for the public good, ought to be at once sought o.t and entered as candidates for the next election. Each of these ought to put down £1000. (Cheers and laughter.) Then they would be prepared to say to the people—"You must subscribe £500,000 more; and with £250,000 worth of exertion and zeal from those who had nothing else to give, they would open the campaign with £1,000,000 sterling." He thought the £10,000 per annum to be raised by the society would be found insufficient; and he wished the Protectionists to take notice that he intended not only to propound, but to carry out this scheme. (Cheers.) He had no ambition to sit in Parliament, but h was ready with his £1000 to sign the roundrobin. (Great cheering.) "On the oath of a Spartan (said the speaker), I declare I will never hesitate until I have reached from the fangs of a corrupt aristocracy the Parliament house of the people of England." (Shrieks of laughter.) He concluded by expressing his most emphatic belief that the "human mind of man" would be irresistible "if it had possession of the purse-strings of the nation." (Cheers and laughter.)

Mr. Miall supported the motion, because the House of Commons was a deception and a fraud. It professed to be representative of the Commons of England, but in reality represented almost everything else.

The resolution being agreed to,

Mr. Sheriff Wire proposed the following resolution —

That this meeting regards with feelings of great satisfaction the proposition of holding a national conference in London during the month of March next, and calls upon the friends of the movement in all parts of the country to assist the council by selecting earnest Reformers to represent them at that important meeting.

The Chairman said he had had a note put in his hand stating that Mr. Jones, the secretary of the Association for Promoting Social Reform, desired to address a few words to the meeting. This was not a Socialist meeting, and therefore Mr. Jones could not be heard on that point; but if he would confine himself to the objects of the meeting, they would be glad to hear him.

The chairman then announced that £1000 had been subscribed in the room, and that the business of the meeting was at an end.

The Rev. Thomas Spencer, who was announced as "an honest Churchman of the Church of England," moved a vote of thanks to the chairman.

The vote having been seconded and carried by acclamation,

Sir Joshua Walmsley acknowledged the compliment. He was the Conservative, and supported this movement because he wished to preserve the rights of property intact.

The meeting then separated.

METROPOLITAN NEWS

THE CHARTISTS AND THE PROTECTIONISTS.

On Monday evening, the first of a series of meetings was held in the hall of the Edinburgh Castle, Stepney, intended to affor. tradesmen, and mechanics, and working men of every grade, an opportunity o agreeing to resolutions in favour of protection to native industry. The meeting was called by the London Trades Protection Society. At half-past seven o'clock the room was overflowing business with the spacious hal. was completely filled with working men. Among those on the platform were Mr. G F. Young, Mr. Richard Oastler, Dr. Brookes, Mr. Foskett, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Delaforce, and others of the trades delegates.

Mr. G. F. Young (the shipowner) opened the ch.ir; and, having opened the proceedings by an exposition of the advantages of Protection, the first resolution was proposed as follows. —

That, as it is known the source of all wealth, it evidently follows that the prosperity and independence of Great Britain and her colonies will be best promoted by employing and protecting the greatest number of healthy, industrious, intelligent, and moral people, who must be educated and comfortably maintained by their own industry; and, therefore in the opinio o this meeting, it is the first and most important duty of the British Legislature and her Majesty's Government to adopt such measures as will best secure employment to every one o the population, and for their labour an abundance of the necessaries and comforts of life

Mr. Oastler (Chartist), rising to address the meeting, denounced the proposal to restore the Protectionists to power, a party which had shown itself to be inimical to public liberty, had allied itself with despotism, and had robbed the people under the pretext of protecting them. (Applause.) He concluded by moving an amendment leaving out the word "protecting" in the first part of the motion, and all the latter clause, substituting a declaration to the effect that the advantages sought for could only be obtained, not by further legislative interference with industry, but by the removal of all remaining impediments to the free exercise of industry, by reducing taxation, by the repeal of the law of primogeniture and entail, and by a system of Parliamentary reform, which would confer the franchise upon the male population. (Cheers.)

The chairman then introduced Mr. Oastler as the friend of the working classes, but the meeting refused to hear him; and as he declined to withdraw, the evening was spent in ineffectual attempts to speak from the platform, interrupted by roars, cheers, hisses, and all the sounds of a menagerie.

The chairman having refused to put Mr. Clarke's amendment, his adherents elected a chairman, and the amendment was then put and carried amidst immense applause, and the meeting was declared to be dissolved.

Shortly afterwards all parties withdrew, Mr. Young declaring the show of hands to be in favour of an adjournment.

ST. GILES'S RAGGED SCHOOL.—A meeting of the supporters of this school was held on Monday evening, at the Music-Hall, Store-street, to receive the annual report. The chair was taken by Sir Jon. and Rev. H. M. Villiers. There were also present many of the clergy and others. The rev. chairman having urged upon the meeting the necessity of aiding the committee in the endeavour to raise a sum of £2500, required for the intended building of which a large sum was yet required, the report was read. It set forth the improved condition, during the last year, of the children connected with the school; 350 boys attended; at the Sunday female schools the average attendance was 65 in the day, and 48 in the evening. The provident fund, from 39 depositors, amounted to £15 0s. 8d. Two lads had been apprenticed, and several girls were put out to service, of whom severally a good report had been received. Four boys and seven girls had been sent out as emigrants, making a total of 18 forwarded from the schools by the committee to Australia. The boys receive there from 10s. to 12s. a week. Towards the new building £448 12s. 9d. had been received; and Mr. Peto, M.P., had promised that when there was a probability of purchasing a freehold site, he would subscribe 100 guineas, and be an annual subscriber of five guineas. The committee are in treaty with the Commissioners of Woods and Forests for an area in Bloomsbury street, St. Giles's. A sum of £900 was necessary to effect the purchase.

BUILDERS' CHARITABLE INSTITUTION.—A general meeting of the members of this institution took place on Tuesday evening, at the Freemasons' Tavern; Mr. Sharp presiding. The report stated that Mr. Grey, one of the presidents of the institution, had given a donation of £100, having previously given 100 guineas to the building fund. Mr. J. H. Peacock (formerly the proprietor of the London Tavern) had also contributed £100, making a total of £5500, to be equally divided between fifty-five charities. The treasurer's account showed an income of £2558. The expenditure was £2134, leaving a balance of £424. The report was unanimously adopted, and a vote of thanks to the chairman for his services the year elected. A statement of the affairs of the building fund, in connexion with this charity, was then given, and a vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the business of the evening

WATER SUPPLY TO THE PARISH OF HAMPSTEAD.—A very numerous and influential meeting of the inhabitants of Hampstead was held at Jack Straw's Castle, on Thursday evening—the Rev. P. Augey (Vicar of Hampstead) in the chair) to consider on the best amendment of the present supply of water to the various dwellings situated in this respectable and wealthy parish; when it was resolved—"That, having heard the statements of the promoters of the London (Watford) Spring Water Company, that it is their intention to bring a supply of water from existing water companies had been unsuccessful, the meeting were of opinion that an abundant supply of pure water to the inhabitants of Hampstead would confer substantial benefits upon them, and that the scheme was one highly deserving of their warm support." A vote of thanks to the rev. chairman concluded the proceedings.

THE LONDON DISPENSARY.—This excellent charity, during the year at has just closed, relieved no less than 2244 persons who were admitted, only 98 of whom died. It likewise relieves poor persons at their own homes, in one of the most destitute parts of the metropolis, viz. Spitalfields. The funds of the charity require replenishing. The Clothworkers' Company have given a donation of £10 10s., and some of the other larger companies, we believe, are about to follow their example.

RELEASE OF VERNON, THE CHARTIST LEADER.—On Friday, in consequence of a communication received by Lieutenant Tracy, the Governor of the House of Correction, Tothill-fields, from the Home-office, intimating that her Majesty had been pleased to extend her pardon to Vernon, the Chartist leader, who was convicted in prance-ney, with Mr. Ernest Jones, and others of sedition, and sentenced by Chief Justice Wilde to two years' imprisonment, with other penalties, and ordering his immediate liberation, he was at once set at liberty. During his incarceration, to support himself he received the weekly pay of the authorities, and it is understood that the sentences on other Chartist prisoners will be mitigated.

RENEVOLENCE.—On Monday next, the sum of £75 will be distributed amongst the poor of Chelsea in the following manner:—To two deserving housekeepers, £30; to 250 distressed parishioners, one quartern loaf each; to two of the most deserving children in the parish charity school, to apprentice them, £2; to 40 of the best behaved children of the parish, to the clergyman, for ex mining the children and preaching to them afterwards, £2; to the organist, for playing on the occasion, £1 10s.; and three minor gifts. The sum thus to be distributed is the dividend of £2500, given by Mr. Thomas Wood, a gold and respectable magistrate and inhabitant of Chelsea, to be appropriated in a similar manner on the 13th of January for ever, unless that day happens to be Sunday.

BATHS AND WASHHOUSES IN ST. MARGARET'S AND ST. JOHN'S, WESTMINSTER.—On Tuesday several houses situated in Ann-street and Peterstreet, Westminster, in pursuance of directions from the Commissioners of Baths and Washhouses for the parishes of St. Margaret and St. John, were sold by auction, for the purpose of being removed to form the site on which it is intended to erect baths and washhouses for that district. There are to be 80 baths, and the many washing and ironing departments. There will also be two plunging baths, each above 40 feet in length, and from about 4 feet to 5 feet 8 inches in depth. The commissioners have purchased the area for the building, and in a few days the select vestry will meet to empower them to borrow £9500, in order to carry the object into effect.

SKATING IN THE PARKS.—Though the ice was but very thin on Sunday last, the number of skaters in the parks was very great, and there were numerous tumbles among them. One of a fatal character occurred in Regent's, where a respectably attired young man, who was skating on the south side, near the aqueduct, broke in, and became immersed in twelve feet of water. Superintendent Murphy and several police-constables immediately put his assistance, but he was not got out until he had been for full four minutes under water, and was quite dead. The body was conveyed to the Royal Humane Society's receiving-house, where every possible remedies were applied by the surgeons, but, unfortunately, without effect. The body was then removed by the parochial authorities to await the inquest, and also to be owned. The name of the deceased was Thomas Drayton. He was last in the employ of Messrs. Chalton and Easton, lead-eaters, Charing-cross.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Births registered in the week ending Jan. 5:—Males, 816; females, 781; total, 1542. Deaths during the same period—Males, 587; females, 555; total, 1142. In the first week of 1840-48, this epidemic ranged from 8 to 86. Hooping-cough, which was fatal to 23 children, is also under the usual number. Measles, scarlatina, and typhus produce nearly the ordinary amount. Diarrhœa is not at all prevalent. Except with the exception of measles, are now much less fatal than in the same week of last year. The daughter of a labourer, aged six years, died at Scott's Cottages, Shepherd's Bush, on the 31st of December, of "marasmus and atrophy," after an illness of six months' duration. From diarrhœa there were only 8 deaths; but 6, which is rather more than usual, occurred from dysentery; 125 deaths were registered last week as having occurred in the workhouses of London, and 94 in hospitals. Seven old pensioners, whose ages ranged from 72 to 82 years, died at Greenwich between the 28th of December and the last of January, inclusive METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—The daily mean reading of the barometer at Greenwich was above 30 inches on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. The mean of the week was 29·867 inches. The mean temperature was lower than the average of seven years on every day except Thursday and Friday; the latter rose 7 deg. above the average of that day. The mean temperature, which was 43 deg. on Friday, fell to 34 deg. on Saturday. The mean of the week was 35 deg.

POSTSCRIPT.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

Friday (yesterday) being the first day of Hilary Term, the Equity Judges sat in their respective Courts in Lincoln's-inn, and the Common Law Judges in Queen's Bench, Hall, Exchequer, and Common Pleas Courts, Westminster Hall. The Judges did not open the Courts in state, anc few persons attended, beyond the professional gentlemen who had business coming on.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

HEALTH OF LORD DENMAN.—Upon the Judges taking their seats on the bench this morning. Mr. Justice Patteson said he was very sorry to say that they had not the satisfaction of Lord Denman's presence at the opening of the Term, but that arose from the very distressing illness of Lady Denman, at Derbyshire. Her Ladyship was, however, better; but she was still so ill that Lord Denman could not leave her with any comfort to himself; but they were in hopes soon to have the pleasure of seeing him there.

CRIMINAL INFORMATION.—THE COUNT DE THOMAR v. THE "MORNING POST."—Sir Frederick Thesiger applied to the Court for a criminal information against Henry Long and Thomas Monsell Crompton. He applied on behalf of the Count de Thomar, of Portugal, whose character and individuality, as well as that of the Queen of Portugal, was assailed in the Morning Post newspaper, of which the defendants were the printers and publishers. The Count de Thomar was, by a Royal Decree, appointed Prime Minister, Secretary of State for the Home Department, and President of the Council of Ministers for Portugal. He had previously held high offices in the State, having before held the office of Secretary of State for Home Affairs, as well as other offices. In the distracted and divided state of the kingdom of Portugal, torn as it had been by factions, it was hardly to be expected that the Count should escape calumny. However, he could not allow to pass unnoticed a statement which appeared in the Morning Post last September, the article in question purported to be a letter from a correspondent in Lisbon, who signed himself "Fabricius," and it assumed to give an account of the circumstances under which the Count de Thomar came into office, and the manner in which he had amassed his very large fortune which he was said to possess. The writer said it was matter of surprise to every one in Portugal how such a man as the Count came to be appointed to form a Ministry, and that the circumstances could not be accounted for, unless it was owing to the light conduct of a high personage that that "compatriot" was named. The Count de Thomar was very reluctant to introduce her Majesty's name into the subject, but he solemnly denied, in the affidavit, that there was the slightest foundation for any such charge. The letter then went on to charge the Count de Thomar, in the most distinct and unequivocal terms, with having amassed a sum of £168,000 by the most corrupt and monstrous practises. That was most distinctly and solemnly denied; and the Count stated that it was wholly and utterly false. The letter further charged the Count with having received a sum of money from a gas company for granting a patent, and that he had received £30,000 for other matters. The Count denied that statement, and stated that the money which had been received for the patent was received in the regular way, and was accounted for by the Government; and he further stated that no part of his estates was obtained by any unfair or fraudulent means whatever. Under these circumstances, he trusted the Court would be of opinion that he was entitled to the rule.—Mr. Justice Patteson: When did the publication of the libel come to the knowledge of the Count?—Sir Frederick Thesiger: It was published in September, but, from the difficulty and delay of communication between this country and Portugal, it was not brought under the notice of the Count until October; and the affidavit could not be got ready until the last day of last term.—Mr. Justice Patteson: Take a rule.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

The accounts received last night from Paris represent the Ministry as having sustained considerable losses during a week that approaches very nearly to a second, in the Chamber. On Thursday evening, the Minister of War called upon the Assembly to send the bill for increasing the pay of non-commissioned officers before the Budget Committee. This offer was to prevent delay in bringing forward the Budget.

General Fabvier opposed the proposition, and moved that the bill be sent to a special committee.

The motion of the General was adopted, and the suggestion of the Minister of War rejected.

In the case of the bill relating to primary school teachers, the object of which is to place them under the control of the Prefects of Departments, an amendment was proposed and carried that the Prefects should not possess the right of dismissing any schoolmaster until they had taken the opinion of the committee which had nominated him. This amendment, it is said, will neutralise the value of the Ministerial measure.

The expedition to Monte Video has been settled by the Government, and is to consist of 2000 men, to be composed as follows:—Two battalions of marine infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and two battalions of marine artillery. Admiral de Bourdieu is to command the flotilla, and Colonel Lannes the troops.

The only fact calling for notice in the Italian news is a statement in the Turin papers of the 8th instant, that a convention for leaving 10,000 Austrians in Tuscany had been concluded with the Grand Duke.

THE TURKISH FLEET.

THE first Illustration on the next page shows the Turkish Fleet at anchor at Terashana,* as the dockyard and arsenal are called. On the 17th of December our Artist counted twelve large men-of war and some smaller vessels there. The Turks could also muster a corvette, two brigs, and two steam-frigates, besides some smaller war-steamers, in the Bosphorus.

The naval arsenal is at the upper end of the Golden Horn.

The British fleet left Bashika Bay, between Tenedos and the entrance to the Dardanelles, on the 16th December, for the anchorage between Mosconisi, or Monk's Island, and the mainland, Gulf of Artaki. Our Artist saw the sails bent and rigging of the vessels across the low ground of Mosco Island as he passed in the Pasha and Oriental ship Sultan, 20th December: the steamer showed the colours, and saluted her, too. In the group in the accompanying Sketch, our artist was able to thrust in his walking-stick—about three-quarters of an inch in diameter. Again, though the embrasures may be built in a tolerable direction for aiming ships once during their passage, it is no doubt that they admit of the guns being trained so little. It is doubtful whether the Turks be good artillerymen, for they seem to have very little practice. Still, to serve out these tasty 700lb. shot quickly, must require some expertness, as was seen in the Russian harbours by our bombs and forts for years. The consequence is that the passage is not so difficult for a fleet as it might easily be made. An English fleet did pass there once—the gun and shot which the Turks fired at the Beagle have been borne off on the occasion; but we must not fancy that the Turks have not much better means of destruction now than then. Any prudent man would march his small-arm men and marines with their Minie rifles across the Bashika Bay, and decide the matter on shore: against such an attack there is scarcely any provision whatever. Once up through this channel, and the way to Constantin ple is clear. The defences of the city for preventing a fleet reaching it from the Black Sea are very few, and if the ships would only sail down, they would stand a chance of being sunk. But when Russia makes up her mind to attack the city of the Sultan, it will be done by an army landing at the end of the Black Sea, far enough out of range of the castles and of the Bosphorus

In the interesting account which James gives of Sir John Duckworth's return through the Dardanelles, we are told that "the Active received a granite shot weighing 800 lbs., and measuring 6ft. 6in. in circumference, which passed through her side 2 feet above the water, and lodged on the orlop deck, close to the magazine scuttle, without injuring a man. The aperture made by it was so wide that Captain Mowbray, on looking over from the side, saw the crew threatening their heads through at the same moment. Had there been a necessity for hauling to the wind on the opposite tack, she must have gone down." Shots of the size here mentioned had never been heard of before, and others evidently still now; besides, from the high importance attached to the channel of the Dardanelles, there have always been feelings of curiosity and wonder with regard to its fortifications.

Perhaps, of all the eight batteries that guard the channel, the most formidable is that of Chanak-Kalesi, or the Inner Fort of Asia. During the time that our squadron was recently at anchor near it, it was thrown open to the inspection of our naval officers, and every attention was paid to them by the Pasha in command. A goodly number of Englishmen were to be seen in his tent every day, all with long pipes in their hands, some enjoying themselves, others evidently smoking from courtesy and curiosity. Our first Illustration shows the Fort of Chanak-Kalesi, from the middle of the channel; and the other, the battery from which the stone shot are discharged. Tl.e guns at present mounted n the lower tier are twenty-six 32-pounders, ten guns for stone shot, and sixteen 16-pounders. There are embrasures in the inner fort for 57 guns more. These would of necessity be of small calibre, but still might do much execution on a vessel, as she would be obliged to pass so close to them.

By far the most interesting gun is that shown in the foreground of the accompanying Sketch. It is in two parts, one of which contains the chamber, and they are screwed together in the middle by the means seen in the drawing. We give below the dimensions of this gun, which is one of the largest, as they vary from 1 ft. 9½ in. to 2 ft 1 in. in the diameter of their bores; and some idea may, we hope, be then formed of the battery. The other guns are all cast in one piece, and two of them bear marks of having been struck by our shot on the occasion we first alluded to:—Length of the gun, 17 ft. 3½ in.; part containing the chamber, 7 ft. 8½ in.; length of chamber, 5 ft. 8½ in.; diameter of bore, 2 ft. 0½ in.; diameter of chamber, 7 in.; thickness of metal in the chamber, 1 ft. 1 in.; thickness of metal in the other part, 4½ in., length of carriage, 17 ft. 10½ in. height of carriage, 2 ft. 6 in.; length of slide, 40 ft. 9 in.; height of slide, 1 ft. 9 in.; diameter of touch-hole ⅝ in.; circumference of shot 6 ft. 3 in. granite weight near 700 lb.

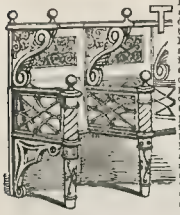
NEW GREEK CHURCH, LONDON WALL.



THIS Church, of which we give Exterior and Interior Views, was opened on Sunday last, which day (O.S., and according to the Greek Kalendar) was Christmas Day. The opening of the Church was an event of great interest, inasmuch as it is the first ecclesiastical structure erected by the Greek residents in London, and the ceremonial was important, as the service included the consecration of the building. In its exterior, the Greek Church is extremely plain except on its north or entrance front, which is divided into two stories by a bold, and enriched moulding, the lower story having an arcade of three arches opening into a corridor, whence admittance into the Church is obtained, and the upper story a similar arcade containing three windows deeply recessed. Groups of windows are on the southern and western walls, besides several single light windows. The capitals of the columns and the enrichments are in good style, and exceedingly well done. Above the triple windows is a sunken panel, containing the following beautiful inscription in Greek characters:—

Σκηπτὴς Βικτορίης Βρεταννῶν μέγαν ἰθυνούσης
Λαὸν, ἰδ' ἀλλ' ἀνδρῶν φῦλα πολυστερέα
Τόνδε θεῷ Σωτῆρι παροικίην εἵσατο Ἑλλήνων
Νηὸν, θεσμοσύνας ἀζομένη πατρίους.

"During the reign of the august Victoria, who governs the great people of Britain and also other nations scattered over the earth, the Greeks sojourning here erected this Church to the divine Saviour, in veneration of the rites of their Fathers."

A bold cornice, supported by consoles, runs round the upper part of the Church, and there are pediments at the respective fronts of the building—that to the north being crowned with a cross. In plan, the Church is a cross of equal parts. The portions of building shown in our Illustration as projecting in the angles of the cross, to the level of the base of the windows, contain the entrance vestibule, staircases to the galleries, &c.

The interior of the Church is peculiar, being very lofty, and, in its general form, differing widely from that of churches as usually arranged. The cruciform character of the interior is not apparent at the lower portion of the church, as the altar-screen shuts off the eastern part, and the space required for the corridor, in the entrance blocks, up the chief of the northern part of the cross.

The ceiling in the centre is domical in form, having a bold dentil moulding at its springing, and a large flower in its centre: over those parts constituting the arms of the cross, the ceiling is arched, panelled, and otherwise enriched; the spandrils being ornamented with enriched paneling. On the northern and southern sides are galleries supported on arches, highly decorated, springing from pillars having extremely bold and effective capitals, the fronts of the galleries containing panels filled with elaborately-worked flower ornaments; the latter enrichment being also carried along the altar-screen. The altar-screen is divided into a centre and two wings; the central portion projects, and has an arched doorway, between pilasters; whilst, on either hand, pictures are in sunken panels, and above the architrave, supported by the pilasters, are pilasters and panels corresponding in number to those in the story below. The middle panel on this story contains the following appropriate inscription:—

στερέωσον, Κύριε, τὴν Ἐκκλησίαν, ἣν ἐκτήσω τῷ τιμίῳ σου αἵματι.

"O Lord, the strength of those who trust in thee, uphold the Church, which thou hast redeemed by thy precious blood."

The centre is finished by a pediment, within which is a dove, surrounded by a glory. The wings have doors in them, surrounded by enriched mouldings, pictures being inserted in panels; in other respects, the architectural features of the wings correspond with those of the central portion. The dwarf door to the centre opening is of picturesque character, and is surmounted by a cross, a curtain of gold embroidered-work filling up the space above the doors. The pictures in the altar-screen were painted in Russia, and represent the Annunciation, the Virgin holding the infant Jesus, Jesus sitting on a throne, and St. John the Baptist. Withinside the screen is the altar, thus separated from the body of the Church, the place wherein it stands being termed the "holy place," symbolic of the Holy of Holies in the Jewish ritual. A magnificent chandelier, holding a great number of wax-lights, is suspended from the ceiling; but in our view it is omitted, to show the whole of the altar-screen.

The congregation in the Greek Church being enjoined to stand during the service, it may be imagined such a task is no easy one; and, therefore, the seats are so made as to enable the congregation to rest on them, yet to appear as if standing. This is accomplished by the seat being made to turn up as in the stalls in our cathedrals, there being knobs placed on the upper arms to serve as armrests. The seats are very richly ornamented with brass-work in the back, and we have shown, in our initial letter, the character of them.

The service on Sunday was, as before mentioned, peculiarly interesting, from the circumstance that the Church was consecrated, the priest inscribing a cross on each of the walls. The altar was consecrated, and covered with a gold-embroidered cloth, and a tall crucifix placed in the centre, silver candlesticks on each side, and, at the foot of the crucifix a beautiful receptacle, called ἀρτοφόριον or bread vessel, containing some of the holy bread dipped in the wine, kept to be used in cases of extreme necessity when the mass cannot be celebrated, as, for instance, to be administered to persons dying. The book of the Gospels, bound in silver, exquisitely chased, was also placed on the altar. After the consecration of the Church, the Gospel was read by the officiating priest, four boys standing before him holding wax tapers, each in a surplice having a blue cross worked on the back; and this scene we have illustrated in one of our Engravings. The same youthful attendants preceded the priest when he brought the elements of the Holy Sacrament from the side altar whereon they had been placed, and put them, with great ceremony, on the high altar. A most striking portion of the ceremony of the mass is that in which the canon is drawn before the altar, whilst the priest reads the prayers for the sanctification of the sacrament. These the priest reads silently and alone; and at their conclusion he advances, draws the curtain on one side, and "bids peace to all the people," and blesses them. The sermon was preached by the priest in his usual dress, a black robe, and wearing his black bat. This is covered with the καλύπτρα or veil, to indicate that the wearer is under the influence of the Gospel, and that he cannot utter anything not in accordance with the Holy Scriptures. The dress of the priest during mass was magnificent in the extreme. The sacred vessels used in the mass are extremely beautiful, the chalice especially being a perfect specimen of art.

The officiating priest is the Rev. Mr. Morfinos.

The erection of so elegant a Church reflects great credit on the liberality of the Greek residents in the metropolis, at the cost of the building has been, we believe, about £10,000, and the number of the residents is not above 220 persons, of all ages—the number of families is about thirty.

We should mention, the architect of the Church is T. E. Owen, Esq., of Portsmouth; and the builders, Mr. Jay, of City-road Basin.

It is intended that there shall be one service every Sunday, commencing at eleven o'clock.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR JAMES MALCOLM, K.C.B.

THIS daring and chivalrous officer, whose maternal grand-uncle, Admiral Sir Thomas Pasley, achieved his Baronetcy by his heroism on the "1st June," and three of whose brothers, Sir Pulteney and Sir Charles Malcolm, Admirals, and Sir John Malcolm, a General, gallantly served their country, was the second son of George Malcolm, Esq., of Burnfoot, in Dumfriesshire, a descendant of Sir Malcolm of Lahore and Incertid, in the county of Fife, who married Miss Margaret Pasley. James Malcolm was born in 1767, and entered the British service when only thirteen years of age. In the 1st Royals he became in due time an officer in the Royal Marines, and he went with Lord Howe to the relief of Gibraltar, in 1782. Malcolm was also senior officer of the marines in the battle of St. Domingo, and he commanded the battalion of that corps distinguished corps for three years, on the north coast of Spain, in the United States, and in Lower and Upper Canada; he was engaged in several actions, and displayed great daring and coolness at the storming of Oswego, in Upper Canada, in 1814. The whole course of active service embraced a period of forty-eight years. In 1815, he was created a K.C B. Sir James Malcolm married, in 1806, Jean, daughter of William Oliver, Esq., of Bonshaw, Roxburghshire, of which county he was Sheriff. Sir James, who was a Lieutenant-Colonel of the Royal Marines at the time of his death, died on the 3d instant, at his seat, Minhalm, Dumfriesshire, aged eighty-three; he has left issue two sons and two daughters, one of whom is married to William Burdyett, Esq.

LIEUTENANT WAGHORN, R.N.

THOMAS WAGHORN, whose name is so meritoriously connected with the improved state of travelling to India, entered the British Navy the 10th November, 1812, and was made a Lieutenant the 23rd March, 1842. His fame lies in his being the originator of the Overland Mail to India, one of the greatest benefits that has fallen to the lot of this country in her communication with her great Eastern empire. The Christmas-day, only, before his lamented death, Mr. Waghorn had returned from Malta, where he had been residing a short time for the benefit of his health, which had been considerably impaired by anxiety of mind, arising chiefly from pecuniary engagements, contracted in his prosecution of the Trieste experiments in 1846, and which liabilities the devotion of all his means and the sacrifice of his entire property were inadequate to liquidate. Independent of the main incidents of his history in connexion with the Indian Overland enterprise, which has immortalized his name as one of the greatest practical benefactors of the age, his career was chequered by many romantic epochs, full of the strangest vicissitudes, and abounding in evidences of character in every way worthy of enduring commemoration. Of the pension lately awarded him by Government, he lived to receive only one quarter's payment. His death was occasioned not so much by any specific disorder as by the general break-up of the system, though the wreck of his iron constitution; his irrepressible energy, offered so great a resistance to the inroads of debility that it was thought to the last he would rally, and his dissolution was attended with much pain and suffering. Lieutenant Waghorn died somewhat suddenly, on the 8th inst., at his residence, Holden-square, Pentonville, in the 49th year of his age. It is sincerely to be hoped that the Government will continue his pension to his widow.

(A Portrait of Lieut. Waghorn will be found in No. 184 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL NICOL, C.B.

THIS gallant Peninsular and Indian officer entered the British service in 1793, and rose, during a long and brilliant career, to be a Lieutenant-General in 1846, when he was also nominated a Companion of the Bath. Nicol was present at the battles of Vittoria, the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, and Orthes, and at the sieges of Nepaul War of 1814, 1815, and 1816, where he commanded a division of the army under Sir David Ochterlony's command.

Lieutenant-General Nicol was Colonel of the 68th Regiment at the time of his demise, which occurred at Clifton, near Bristol, on the 6th inst.

A FAMILIAR PHASE OF AMERICAN SLAVERY:—"For sale, a coloured girl, of very superior qualifications, who is now in Mr. Hall's gaol in Norfolk. She is what speculators call a fancy girl—a bright mulatto, fine figure, straight black hair, and very black eyes; remarkably neat and cleanly in her person. I venture to say that there is not a better seamstress, cutter and fitter of ladies' and children's dresses, in Norfolk, or elsewhere, or a more fanciful knitter of head bags, money purses, &c. Any lady or gentleman in Norfolk or Portsmouth, who may wish to purchase a girl of this description (whom I consider the most valuable in Virginia), may take her and try her a month or more at my risk, and if she does not suit and answer the description here given, may return her to Mr. Hall. The cause of offence for which I intend (though reluctantly) to sell her, is, that she has been recently induced, by some coloured persons, to make her escape with them to the north, in which she failed, and is now for sale. Apply to the subscriber in Suffolk, or to Mr. James Murcaugh, or C. C. Robinson, of Portsmouth, for further information. JOSEPH HOLLADAY."—Anti-Slavery Reporter.

MR. BRIGHT, M.P., ON THE CONDITION OF IRELAND.

A public meeting was held in the Corn Exchange, Manchester, last week, for the purpose of presenting to Mr. John Bright, M.P., an address from the Irish residents in Manchester and Salford, in testimony of their high appreciation of the able and honest manner in which he advocated the claims of the sister country at the late meeting in the Free-Trade Hall. There was a numerous attendance.

Mr. Bradshaw occupied the chair, and in opening the proceedings depicted the miserable condition of Ireland, which he ascribed to the coercive and persecuting policy of former British Parliaments.

The Rev. Daniel Hearne moved, and Dr. Murphy seconded, and Mr. M'Cluskey, of Bedford, supported the presentation of a long address to Mr. Bright, of a highly complimentary character, and strongly expressive of gratitude to him for his recent exposure of Irish grievances.

The motion having been carried, and the address presented, amidst general cheering, Mr. Bright addressed the crowded assembly. Having acknowledged the gratifying compliment which had been just paid to him, he proceeded to rebut charges which had been made against him in some leading journals, arising out of his late speech at the Free-Trade Hall. He said: "In all the principal newspapers throughout Great Britain and Ireland, there seemed to be no attempt made to deny the facts which I had laid before the public. (Cheers, and a cry of 'Hugh M'Neile.') I believe the most powerful organ of the press in this country had nothing to say against it, and that the statements were not in my own way. But that I had myself admitted in the speech. I said, if I recollect right, that for thirty years past the Imperial Legislature had had laid before it, time after time, a statement of the actual condition of the Irish people; and I said that it was a serious charge against the Constitution of this country—against the aristocratic form of our Government—that all these statements had passed unregarded, and that the condition of Ireland had been growing worse, until recently, excited any real solicitude on the part of either the Ministry or Parliament. At length an influential organ of the Whig party in the Scottish metropolis brought another charge against me, which was, that I was fostering that want of self-reliance which has been charged against the Irish people, when I blamed the laws and institutions under which they lived. But I should like to know upon what the Irish people are to rely, if not upon their self-reliance as the editor of that paper; but I have stated before, and state again, that the Irish people are not the possessors of Ireland; that the country is not theirs—that the land is not theirs; that it has been purposely, and systematically, and by law, prevented from becoming theirs; that Irishmen are the only people in Europe in their own land; that the raw material of a nation's industry, the soil, is in chains, and in chains of law, and therefore to rely upon that as a source of industry is impossible. And, further, I have shown that if, by any means, there is any industry and any productiveness, there is no security for the reward of industry, and therefore no stimulus for the exercise of it by the people. (Loud cheers.) To tell the literal fact with regard to Ireland, the soil of that country was taken from them two centuries past, in the possession of the enemy. The present possessors of land are the successors of those who were the possessors of it through conquest and through confiscation—(loud cheers)—and the laws of that country, of the Imperial Legislature, and of your Legislature, when it was under the power of the corrupt Parliament of those times, have prevailed in Ireland from that time to this, have made it impossible for the Irish people to become possessors of the soil of their own country. In fact, it is in the possession of no people but a necessarily poor people.—If I may quote the very notorious expression of a very notorious individual—as aliens in blood, in language, and in religion. (Cheers.) Now, we will not go back to these bygone days 200 or 300 years ago, and contend that the acts of those days can be reversed; but I do assert that it would have been possible for the Legislature to have taken such precautions with regard to property in Ireland, that there would have been a competition among the people for the exercise of the virtues of industry, given to Irishmen a common faith, which is by no means necessary, you might long ago have given them a common interest in the redemption of their common country. (Loud cheers.) We find the people of Ireland in a condition of forced idleness, because the great raw material of their industry is placed without their reach."

He next dwelt on what he considered the grand obstacle to the improvement of the social condition of Ireland—the monopoly of land. The subdivision of the soil into very small tenements, and the competition amongst the peasantry for these miserable holdings are excessive, and are fraught with evil consequences. The majority of the landlords neglect their duties as proprietors; they are reckless and beggared.

"The cultivators are poor, they are unskilful. Under the pressure of recent circumstances they are leaving the country by every vessel, and carrying with them whatever skill they have, and whatever small property they have saved from the wreck of their fortunes in Ireland. In fact, the export of Ireland consists now of Irishmen. (Hear, hear.) And they do not go abroad to found flourishing colonies, to live in amity with the present country; but whenever they set their foot on a foreign soil, there stands a man in whose breast rankles a feeling of hostility to this country. ('Hear, hear,' and cheers.) And which is true how has been true for 70 or 80 years at least, for it is upon record that Lord North himself was the first to assert the injury which Irishmen in America had done to England; for their courage and their hostility against this country, united, in the war of independence, was the main cause of the first and signal successes which the Americans gained." (Cheers.)

What are the remedies? Not additional capital; for the landlords are perpetually drawing large sums from England upon mortgages on their property between the years 1837 and 1847: they thus raised not less than £14,000,000. Not emigration; for half-a-million individuals perished in the late famine, and another half-million have emigrated, so that there is not a sufficiently abundant population left on the soil properly.

"I should propose, with respect to entails, that the law should not permit any man to tie up any landed property beyond what are called 'lives in being;' that is, whosoever may be mentioned in the will, that the last person mentioned shall be the person to whom the property should be the absolute possessor of the property, and that it should not be lawful for any by this will to any person not born when the will was made. (Hear, hear.) That would very much limit the number of what are called 'life interests,' that is, where a man possesses an estate for his life, and his son, or somebody, comes after him; so that he spends nothing upon it, being interested only in getting out of it what he can during his lifetime, and careless whether, after that, it goes to ruin or not. With respect to another case of estates, those which are left by persons who make no will at all:—If a man had 50,000 acres of land, and died without a will, if he had 10 children, the eldest son would take the whole of that land. If the father has made no provision for the younger children, they may be beggars in the country, dependent upon the elder brother; or, as the younger branches general y are, or wish to be, dependent upon the State and the public purse. (Hear.) This, if we were to propose to it, would appear a frightful injustice. It is unjust to the nine children that they should have nothing, and that the one should have all. It is a gross injustice to the family at large, and a gross evil to the country as to its social comfort, that these vast estates should be handed down under circumstances most unfavorable to the development of the resources of the land and the profitable employment of the industrious people who live upon it." (Hear.) Let him leave it in what proportions he likes to his children; but, where he makes no such award of it himself, then let the law do that which alone natural affection and common justice would do—divide it equally, make an equal division of it amongst the children who survive him. (Loud cheers.) I would propose that every individual should establish a complete registry of property. There is now in Ireland a registry of deeds, and there is a survey made by the Ordnance Department so minute that you might trace upon the survey plot of land through every field of which it is made up. If there was a registry of land, it would be quite competent for the buyer and seller of an estate, or of a field, or of an acre, or of a house, to walk into a certain office and say, 'Here is a piece of property which I wish to transfer to the buyer, and to have a certificate of sale made out.' (Hear.) Then I would take care that those expensive stamps which are now laid on the sale and purchase of property should be for the most part abolished, or reduced to a nominal amount, so that there might be the greatest facility given for the dispersion of landed property amongst those who have money to purchase it, and industry and skill to make the best use of it. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the stamps upon settlements, that is a piece of injustice which the public has never yet said much about. If a man has £100,000 a year in landed property, and chooses to settle it upon his eldest son, or son-in-law, or grandson, or anybody else, the stamp for the settlement of that enormous amount is £25; and if you were to take one of your boys and indenture him to a first-rate surgeon as an apprentice, and pay a fee of £500 or £600 with him, you would have to pay an amount for a stamp quite equal to that for the settlement of the vast amount of landed property. (Hear, hear.) Now, I propose that these stamps upon sales and transfers should be abolished, or made of a nominal amount; and if there be a deficiency in the revenue, as there would be from this, I should propose that the stamps on settlements should be levied, not at a fixed sum, but ad valorem, rising with the amount of the property, thus making up for the deficiency caused by the abolition of the present enormous stamp upon small estates. I think such a discouragement upon this most pernicious system of settling landed property from generation to generation, and keeping it entirely out of the market, and away from the field of industry, (Loud cheers.)

* * * * * * *

If land were free in Ireland, every man would hope to become a proprietor; prudence would become the rule; young people, before they married, would take into consideration their future prospects; they would hope for the possession of a few acres of land, and the adding to it in the course of years. Every child save money enough; all these motives would act upon them, and there would be association and a spirit of hopefulness amongst the population of Ireland which there never can be under the present system."

He would next give security to the tenant by lease and otherwise, for his improvements on his farm.

"If, at this moment, every Irish cultivator and farmer could be told that every farthing he laboriously expended upon his land should not become the property of the landlord, but should remain his property, you would find a new spirit infused into the whole of the population; I believe it would spread a universal joy over Ireland, such as never has been known in our time."

To those social remedies he would add the political ones of enlarged and more faithful Parliamentary representation, and a reform of the present Church establishment; and he looks to the united efforts of the great Reform party now growing up in England, and of all intelligent Irishmen, as the means whereby those ends can be accomplished.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

From the changeable state of the weather for the last fortnight, scarcely any of the coursing meetings, of which notice had been given, have "come off," and field-sports in general have been at a stand-still. For the same reason, while we consider it time to give the present fixtures for the ensuing week, they must be received with the customary prefix at this season, "weather permitting." They show little promise of sport of any interest, Bramley alone appearing in the steeple-chase calendar (for Tuesday next), and in the coursing appointments being confined to Middleham, on Wednesday and Thursday, the Amicable Club, on Thursday and Friday (but where none save the members can tell), and the Lytham New Club, on the same days. As we intimated in our last, the list of January entries are highly gratifying in all quarters, subsequent additions even having made the Chester Cup very considerably better than the accounts first published led us to anticipate. On the whole, we look for a brilliant racing season.

APPARATUS TO PREVENT FATAL ACCIDENTS ON THE ICE.—In a letter signed "Humanitas," in the Morning Post, it is suggested that two high poles, connected at the top, be erected on the banks of a piece of water, passing through a pulley a long rope attached to an inflated India-rubber ball, covered with network. This should be thrown to the person having the misfortune to break through the ice, who, on laying hold of the ball, might be lifted out of the water; and thus the present plan, of dragging persons through or under the ice, be got rid of.

MELANCHOLY SHIPWRECK OFF RAMSGATE.—Nearly abreast of Ramsgate, on Sunday morning, at daybreak, a melancholy scene presented itself. Two brigs were perceived labouring on the Brake, and the crew of one of the ill-fated vessels was seen crowding in the maintop. An immense heavy sea was breaking over the wreck, and the melancholy fate of the poor fellows seemed certain. Several luggers made an effort to reach them; the formidable character of the surf prevented them, however, and between nine and ten o'clock the mainmast, on which they had collected, snapped and went overboard, the poor fellows being carried with it. Not one was seen afterwards. It is alleged that had a lifeboat been put off it could have reached the wreck, and rescued the unfortunate crew. The ill-fated vessel outlived the storm but a short time. The foremast quickly went, and before noon she had disappeared. The name of the vessel is not correctly ascertained. The remains of a log-book, bearing the name of the William and Ann, were picked up near the Brake, and it is conjectured that might be her name. The other wreck was the Nauarino, Mr. Boys, master, of Whitby. The crew, however, succeeded in getting away in their boat, and were taken on board a vessel which was riding some distance off. The poor fellows were landed at Broadstairs.

MATCH OF CHESS BY CORRESPONDENCE

BETWEEN THE LONDON CHESS-CLUB AND THE AMSTERDAM CHESS-CLUB, FOR ONE HUNDRED GUINEAS.—TERMINATION OF THE CONTEST.

A communication, just received, from the Committee of the Amsterdam Chess-Club, brings us the gratifying intelligence that they have determined to protract their defence no longer. The match, which was to consist of a single game, is, therefore, over; the London Chess-Club fairly carrying off the honours of victory, after a struggle which, although of only fifty moves a side, has lasted nearly two years.

If the relative skill of the competitors engaged on each side were to be the gauge by which to estimate the probable result of a contest like this, it would have been easy to predict to which party victory would incline; and we should have wondered at the daring gallantry that prompted the little band of Hollanders to challenge the Leviathans of London. Experience, however, has shown that, in a Match of Chess by Correspondence, the battle is not always to the strong, and that foresight and profound calculation are of infinitely less account, when the men may be moved experimentally, than they are in ordinary Chess, where conclusions must be tried by the head and not by the hand. Of this, indeed, the archives of the London Club itself afford a memorable instance. In March, 1824, a proposal was made to this Club by the Club at Edinburgh, to play a Match at Chess by Correspondence for a silver cup: the match to consist of a rubber of three games (irrespective of drawn games); two games to be played together, and the winner of the first game to have the move in the third. The London Club at this period was in the pride and plenitude of its strength, and the Committee appointed to conduct the Match comprised every name of note among the Chess-players of the metropolis.* The Edinburgh Chess-Club, on the other hand, was composed of amateurs comparatively unknown and inexperienced, and possessed one player only, the late Mr. Donaldson, capable of making any thing like a stand over the board with any one of the London chiefs. In an ordinary contest, indeed, it was the old odds of "Lombard-street to a China orange." Mangre all the advantages of superior skill and practice, however, the Londoners lost the battle, and lost it by a blunder as ridiculous as it was vexatious, at the very moment too when the game was in their hands.

But, to return to the present match. In the arrangements for their contest with Amsterdam, the London Club very prudently avoided the two grave errors of their predecessors—one of which consisted in their appointing too numerous a committee, and the other, in agreeing to play more than one game at a time. On the present occasion, the committees was limited to five members—Messrs. Slous, Horwitz, G. Medley, Walker, and Perigal; and as three only of these gentlemen, if we are correctly informed, took any active part in the conduct of the match, they had but a single game to give their attention to, no great embarrassment was likely to arise, either from a multitude of opinions or the diversity of objects to be examined.

It will be seen from the following communication, which was originally transmitted by the members of the Amsterdam Chess-Club to Mr. Staunton, with a request that he would exert his influence to promote the match, and add to its interest by taking part in the struggle, that the challenge emanated from the players of Amsterdam, and not, as many suppose, from the London Club:—

"Amsterdam, Jan. 3, 1848.

"The members of the Philidor Chess-Club, of this city, although fully convinced of the superiority of the leading chess-players of your capital, and the unequal chances of a contest with your Club, but desirous of deriving some benefit from the skill and ingenuity of your players, herewith do themselves the pleasure of inviting your members to a single or double game at Chess, by correspondence, for a certain stake, the amount of which to be respectively deposited at a London and Amsterdam bank. The Committee of this society is desirous to ascertain from you the amount of the stake you wish to play for, and the chief conditions upon which matters can be finally arranged; and request, at all events, an early reply.

"We remain, respectfully, your obedient servants,

"THE COMMITTEE OF THE PHILIDOR CHESS-CLUB.

"To the London Chess-Club."

* The Committee consisted, among others, of Messrs. Cochrane, Fraser, Lewis, Mercier, and Parkinson—all players of the highest mark at that time.

AND AMSTERDAM SURRENDERED.

(a) This appears to us a most objectionable move, and to have much retarded the development of the London game. They ought rather to have Castled.

(b) To prevent the advance of the adverse K's Pawn.

(c) This was played, apparently, from apprehension of Black moving their K B to Q Kt 5th. In White's place, we should have preferred bringing out the K. Bishop, or even advancing the K. Pawn, which leads to many exciting variations. Let us suppose—

WHITE.	BLACK.
8. P to K 4th	Q P takes P.
9. P takes P	P takes P
10. Kt takes P	Kt takes Kt
11. B takes Kt	Bis Q Kt 5th (ch)
12. B to Q 2nd	Q to K R 4th (ch)
13. K to K 2d	Q takes B
14. Q to K B 3d	K to K B sq, or
15. Q to K R 5th (ch)	Q takes Q

WHITE.	BLACK.
16. P to K 5th	P to K 3d
17. Kt to Kt 3d	B takes Kt (ch)
18. P takes Kt	R to K B 3d
19. Q to Q B 3d	R to Q B 3d
20. Castles on Q side	R to Q 3d, or Kt to Q B 2d
21. B takes R	P takes B
22. It takes K Kt P (ch)	R to B 3d
23. Q R to K B sq, and White must win.

(d) This appears to us a very questionable move, and to have much retarded the development of the adverse Q Kt.

(e) Threatening to win the adverse Q Kt P.

(f) Having compromised themselves by the premature advance of the Q B P, White were obliged to throw forward this Pawn.

(g) An important step, in anticipation of White's Castling, in which case, by playing the K Rook to K sq, and following that with P to K Kt 4th, Black would have got a fine attack on the King's quarters.

(h) The beginning of a combination, which results in Black winning a clear Pawn.

(i) Q to her R 4th, attacking the two Pawns, would have been useless, as Black might safely have answered with P to Q Kt 4th, or Q Kt P takes P.

(k) The correct play. Far better than taking either with the Bishop or Pawn.

(l) This, in the opinion of the London players, was an error, from the ill consequences of which their opponents could never extricate themselves. It appears to have been made in utter unconsciousness that Black would ever dare to play their Kt in to Q B 5th.

(m) A move like this, by which Black voluntarily subject themselves to the apparent disadvantage of a double Pawn and the weakening of their centre, must have been the result of a most profound and accurate calculation.

(n) To enable them to Castle, which they obviously could not do before without losing the exchange.

(o) If to K Kt 4th looks inviting, and will be found to lead to many interesting variations; if White, however, make the proper reply (which is Kt to K B 3d), the result is not greatly in Black's favour.

(p) If they had taken P with P, Black would have captured the Q B P with their Bishop, secure of subsequently gaining the other Pawn.

(q) To prevent the advance of the P to Q B 4th. Suppose, instead, White had played—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK
25. Kt takes P	Q B takes Kt	26. B takes R B	R takes B

Having gained a piece.

(r) The depth and accuracy of Black's calculation, when at move 16 they played the Kt to Q B 5th, in striking a blow at the weakening of the adverse centre Pawn, though threatened by innumerable foes, remains invincible.

(s) If Q to Q K sq, the following are not improbable—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
28. Q R to B sq	Q Kt to Q B sq	30. R takes B	Q takes K P (ch)
29. P to K R 3d	Q R to B 5th	31. K to R sq	Q takes K P, &c.

(t) Instead of so playing, they might have moved either the K Kt to Q sq, or the Q Kt to Q sq. In the first place, let us suppose—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
33. K Kt to Q sq	K B to Q Kt 5th	35. K to Q 3d	Kt to Q 4th
34. K to B 2d	R to K sq	And then, by playing better to do).

And then, by playing P to Q B 5th, Black gain a piece. In the second place—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
33. Q Kt to Q sq	R takes P	35. K to R 3d.	Kt to Q 4th
34. It takes R	R to Q B 8th	And Black must win

(u) This was well played, as it tempted Black to capture the K B Pawn; in which case the game in all probability would have been drawn.

(v) Indispensably necessary to preserve their Q Pawn.

(w) The play of Black throughout the latter stages of the game could hardly be improved. How admirably timed is the advance of this little Pawn!

(x) Black's object now is to compel their opponents to move either their K ng or Kt. If the former stirs, the Pawn at once proceeds to Queen; and, if the latter moves, the B ack King marches to support the Pawn, and wins, of course, without trouble.

(y) All other moves are now expended, and White are forced to play the King or Cavalier.

MUSIC.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Mendelssohn's oratorio, "St. Paul," has been revived at Exeter Hall, Costa conducting this work for the first time. This celebrated work, which by many amateurs is considered the composer's greatest production in the sacred school, and is preferred even to his much later oratorio, "Elijah," was originally produced at the Dusseldorff Musical Festival, on the 22nd of May, 1836. The executants on that occasion were:—Instrumentalists, 172; chorus soprani, 106; alti, 60; tenori, 90; bassi, 108: total, 535.

The first introduction of this work in England was at the Liverpool Musical Festival, October 7, 1836, thanks to the enterprise of the Novellos, who had purchased the score. Sir G. Smart conducted, and Francois Cramer was leader. The principal singers were Madame Caradori (in place of Madame Malibran, who died at Manchester), Mrs. Wood, Mrs. A. Shaw, Miss Birch, and Mrs. Knyvett; Messrs. Braham, J. Bennet, and Phillips.

On the 20th of October, 1837, the composer was the conductor of his own work at the Birmingham Musical Festival, the singers being Mrs. Knyvett, Miss Clara Novello, and Mrs. Shaw; Messrs. Vaughan, Bennett, Hobbs, Machin, A. Novello, and Phillips. On the 28th of June, and July 5th, 1844, Mendelssohn conducted "St. Paul" before Prince Albert and the Duke of Cambridge, at Exeter Hall. On the 2nd of June, 1845, her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance of this oratorio with their presence. The singers were the Misses Birch and Bolby, Messrs. Mawyers, A. Novello, Bodda, and Herr Staudigl.

"St. Paul" treats of the sufferings of the first Christian Church, the accusation of Stephen, his death and funeral. Then there is the persecution of the Church by Saul, his journey to Damascus, and his hearing of the voice from Heaven. The conversion of Paul, his subsequent persecution, the calling together of the Elders of the Church of Ephesus, and his departure for Jerusalem complete the work. The choruses distributed throughout this oratorio, like the chorus in the Greek tragedy, are most important features in the construction of the work. Mendelssohn's profound acquaintance with the Bach forms is proved in the "St. Paul." There is, perhaps, more evidence of sustained power in "St. Paul" than in "Elijah," and the individuality of the composer is more marked. The opening chorus, "Lord, thou alone art God," with the succeeding chorale, "To God on high," are very fine. The chorus in D minor, "Now this man," is dramatic in power, and prepares the way for the awful outbreak of savage fury in the "Stone him to death," from the multitude. The chorale, "To thee, O Lord," with the lovely chorus "Happy and blest," are floods of sonorous and graceful harmony, in the same delicate character of the preceding chorus. The "Sleepers, awake!" is another magnificent chorale; and the chorus "Oh great is the depth," a most splendid specimen of Mendelssohn's colouring. The conclusion of the Conversion is a sublime conception. The chorus "How lovely are the messengers," the chorale quartet "Oh! then the true and only light," the chorus "Is this he," the "Oh! be gracious," with its elegant instrumentation, and the chorus finale, are amongst the most remarkable items in the second part. The solo pieces in this oratorio are of great beauty. The charming air in B flat, "Jerusalem, Jerusalem," the air, "I will sing of thy great mercies," are allotted to the soprano. The contralto air, "But the Lord is mindful of his own," is a perfect gem of melodious inspiration. The two bass songs in B minor, "O God! have mercy," and "Consume them all," are noble compositions. The tenor has some very responsible recitatives to sing, and an elegant cavatina, with violoncello obligato, "Be then faithful unto death." The general character of the music is fervent, lofty, and grand; and yet are the subjects treated with beautiful simplicity. Of its present style of execution—with Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, Mr. A. Novello, Mr. Smythson, and Herr Formes as principal singers—we must postpone our comments until next week, as the performance takes place after our paper is at press on Friday night.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.) PARIS, Wednesday.

Meyerbeer has quitted Paris for Vienna, to mount his "Prophète," which has now been given here, at the Grand Opera, forty times—and still in its career of success as great as ever. Vlardot, however, will now leave us for a short time, to sing the "Prophète" in German at Berlin. The great event at the Italian Opera-house has been the welcome return of Lablache, as Don Pasquale. Carnival was rapturously received. Ronconi was the Dandini, and acted with the greatest humour. The duo between him and Lablache was a rare trial of strength in what is called, in theatrical parlance, "gagging"—but frequently the orchestra came to a stand-still at the sallies of these great comedians. Lutchesi (the new tenor), in the Prince, was excellent; and Mdlle. Angri sang brilliantly as Cenerentola. Altogether, the opera was finely executed.

The most novel feature of the year 1849 displayed by the entertainers in Paris, considering that revolution and cholera had to be contended against, at the Grand Opera, the production of the "Prophète," with the débuts of Viardot, Mdme. Castellan, and M. Roger, was the grand event. The "Farali," of Adam, was the other novelty, and the ballet of "La Filleule des Fées," by Perrot. At the Opéra Comique, the new works have been the "Caid," the "Montenegrina," and the "Fée aux Roses" by Adolphe Adam.

The total of new dramatic and musical works produced in 1849 was 148; in 1848, it was 257. The deaths of note have been those of Habeneck, Chopin, Kalkbrenner, Bandiot, Louis Sejan, Bandenay, Duvernoy, and Mdme. Pradher.

A Paris institution, Mdme. Edmond, last Sunday night.——Mr. E. O. Toulmin gave a concert at the Horns, Kennington, on Tuesday night, assisted by Messrs. A. Irving, Bramley, Lefler, and Richardson (flautist), Misses Birch and Dolby.——At the same time, Mr. Lindsay Sloper's concert, the instrumentalists were Thalberg, Ernst, and Richardson; and the vocalists, Misses Poole, Eyles, Dolby, Mrs. A. Newton, Messrs. Reeves, Land, Lefler, and Herr Formes.——Mr. John Parry's entertainment of "Lights and Shades" was given on Saturday night, at the Hanover-square Rooms, in the presence of a numerous auditory. His great specialty seems boy soprano, tenor, and basso, was much applauded, as also his solo on the concertina.——Mdme. Sontag, on Monday, at Exeter Hall, Mr. Ella's concert will give his annual monster concert: every available talent, native and foreign, appears in the programme.——On the same evening, Mr. Willy will give, in the room at St. Martin's Hall, his fourth concert of classical chamber music.——The anniversary festival of the Madrigal Society, founded in 1741, will be celebrated on Thursday, at Freemasons' Hall, Lord Saltoun in the chair, supported by Sir Andrew Barnard.——The members of the Musical Union, for the sixth season, are fixed for Tuesdays, March 19, April 9 and 23, May 7 and 21, June 4 and 18, and July 2nd.——Mr. Anderson, master of the Queen's band, and director and bon. treasurer of the Philharmonic Society, has been elected hon. treasurer of the Royal Society of Musicians, in place of the respected Mr. Parry, who has been compelled to resign, from the continuance of severe illness.——Mdme. Sontag, with Calzolari, F. Lablache, &c., sang at a concert at Sheffield, last Tuesday.——Mr. Balfe, we may say, is the tame of a boy; my second breathes sorrow; my third urges progress; my whole signifies "Peaceful."—(Solutions in our next.)

MR. HUDSON, THE IRISH COMEDIAN.—We have received a letter from this gentleman, dated from Aster House, as well as from the manager of the Broadway Theatre, stating that the report of Mr. Hudson having been several times hissed lately in New York is entirely without foundation, he having been invariably successful throughout his two engagements.

THE THEATRES.

OLYMPIC.

Mrs. Mowatt's comedy of "Fashion; or, Life in New York," produced at this theatre on Wednesday, commands critical and public attention; not as a work presented for the first time on the English stage, and representing English manners, but as a genuine American production (written in 1845), acknowledged by the Americans themselves to comprise true portraits of their own characters and true accounts of their own actions, which, after having been repeated at nearly every theatre in the United States with uniform success, now appeals to a British audience; not for the confirmation of Transatlantic opinions upon it, as a work of art; but for our acceptance as a piece of information, as so much knowledge put into a dramatic form, which, whether or not it be a stage, would be welcome to an intelligent and cultivated mind. In the language of one of the characters in Mrs. Mowatt's comedy, "The fashions of Europe grow antediluvian before the Americans discover their existence; they are laughed behind the age—consequently!" Pen honour, a foreigner of refinement finds great difficulty in existing in such a provincial atmosphere." This statement indicates the key-note of the comedy; all that takes place in its action is consequent on or incidental to the working out of the condition of life hints predicated.

The chief character is that confided, and with great judgment, to Mrs Marston It is that of a Mrs. Tiffany, a lady who imagines herself to be fashionable; a purse-proud upstart and ignoramus, with a speculative penchant, who picks up her French from her waiting-maid Multnotis (Mrs. Wigan), affects Parisian manners, and is liable to be duped by every foreign adventur r. The mixture of vulgarity and affectation was all in this lady's way; and she revelled, almost to caricature, in the impersonation. Miss Tiffany's great desire is to marry her daughter, Seraphina (Miss A. Gougenheim), to a pretended French Count Jolimaitre (Mr. Wigan), who, while accepting the daughter's hand, makes love to the governess of the family, Gertrude (Miss Fanny Vining), and turns out in the end to be a former lover of Millmette, and a cook out of place. But the victim par excellence of the piece is the parvenu husband, whose commercial speculations are unequal to his domestic expenditure, and who seeks to bolster up his credit by committing forgery. Mr. Tiffany (Mr. James Johnstone) la, by these means, made the butt of his own confidential clerk, Snobson (Mr. Scharf), who extorts from him additional salaries, and a promise of his daughter's hand. The pretended feast having run off with Seraphina, Snobson gets drunk, and intrudes among the drawing-room company for the purpose of exposing his master, but being convicted as an accessary to the criminal transaction, is glad to make off. The other characters are, with one or two exceptions, the usual drawing-room appendages of the state of society portrayed. The exceptions are one Adam Trueman, a farmer from Catteranga (Mr. Davenport), and Prudence, a maiden lady of a certain age (Mrs Parker). The former is, in fact, the grandfather of the orphan, Gertrude, who, being on the spot to look after his grandchild, delivers her from Sidonière and the consequences of her enemies. The poor girl falls into suspicion by herself contriving a plot for the exposure of the pretensions of the imposter, whereby she almost loses her grandfather's regard, and the heart of her lover, Colonel Howard (Mr. Bolton). This confusion is partly owing to the intermeddling of Prudence, who forms a matrimonial design on farmer Adam, and in the second act makes love to him in a scene, which for freshness and originality has never been exceeded. Partianically dressed, with an American intonation quite remarkable, Mrs. Parker has, in this character, accomplished a portrait, which, if somewhat exaggerated, exhibits, nevertheless, such points of vitality and verisimilitude that it must soon become as popular as it is indeed richly ridiculous.

Such are the materials of which this comedy is composed. Its story is indicated in the above statement; though it is necessary to detail its plot, for the drama is not dependent on story for its incident, but on the intercombination of characters, groups and situations. We have only to add, that the play, in respect to its scenery, costume, and appointments, was magnificently mounted. Its triumph was complete. Mrs Mowatt was, of course, called for, and was brought on the stage in an evident state of agitation, naturally consequent on the excitement of such a decided success.

At the other principal theatres, the system of revivals still continues. At DRURY, Mrs. Nisbett appeared on Monday, in the character of Rosalind, on which occasion Mr. Vandenhoff performed Jaques in a style remarkable for its classical conception and finish. Mr. Anderson himself wants for Orlando and Mr Cooper Old Adam. At the SURREY, Mr. Creswick has, during the week, enacted Alfred Evelyn in Sir E. B. Lytton's comedy of "Money," and, at the MARYLEBONE, Mr. Watling's melodrama of "Nicholas Nickleby" has been the stock piece of the evening.

SADLER'S WELLS.

THE scene selected by the Artist from the Pantomime of "Harlequin and the Dragon of Wantley," at this theatre, is that in which the voracious Dragon gobbles up a child just as the Baron of Wantley is sitting down to his family dinner. After satisfying the immediate cravings of his inordinate appetite with the best of the Baron's viands, he finishes with carrying off the Baron's daughter, whom, as a delicate morsel, he reserves for a future repast. In this intention, however, the Dragon is disappointed; for Moore of Moore-hall, being in love with the young lady pursues the spoiler, and, in a pugilistic encounter, gives him a blow that proves a complete "settler." Then, of course, as nothing else remains to be done, everybody is transformed, and the usual pantomimic tricks and bustle ensue.

This is a scene of genuine Pantomime, the grotesqueness of the masks is as legitimate as any five-act play.

ADELPHI THEATRE.

THE Christmas extravaganza at this theatre is from the melodrama "Frankenstein," which many years since attracted large audiences of those who woo terror to delight themselves, in the old Lyceum Theatre. The piece was an extravagant affair per se, and how burlesque has heightened its absurdities, can better be told in picture than in words. The scene chosen by our Artist is the interior of the laboratory, and the situation, the fright of Frankenstein at the sight of the Model Man of his own creation. The piece, from the already practised pen of the Brothers Brough, increases in popularity on each repetition.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—OPERA COMIQUE.

ON Monday night the season commenced (for the first time in this country) with the opera, in three acts, "Le Val d'Andorre," the music composed by Halévy, the composer of "La Juive," "Guido et Ginevra," "Charles VI," "L'Eclair," "Les Mousquetaires de la Reine," "La Reine de Chypre," "Le Drapier," &c., and the libretto by M. le Saint-Georges. This work was originally produced in Paris, on the 11th of November, 1848, and was noticed in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of the 18th of November. A second article on the opera appeared in our columns, December 2nd following, from which we extract the following remarks:—"Halévy's music is delicious, full of quaint and elegant melodies, scored with consummate skill, and in the concerted pieces rising at times sublimely in dramatic eminents. It is a great work in every sense—pictorial, dramatic, and musical. The Opera Comique will run the 'Valley of Andorra' at least a hundred nights, so, when the tide of success rolls in here, it is overwhelming." We have proved to be good prophets. It was only a few days since that the hundredth night of "Le Val d'Andorre" was celebrated in Paris, by a dinner of the composer, author, publishers, artistes, &c.

The story of the "Val d'Andorre" is very interesting, in some degree resembling that of the "Maid and the Magpie." The curious republic which exists between France and Spain, in the Eastern Pyrenees, under the title of the Valley of Andorra, is the scene of action. Stephan, a young hunter of the chamois and bear, is attached to and is believed by Rose de Mai, a servant in a widow-farmer's house, Thereza. He is the pet of the valley, for Thereza herself, and Georgette, another woman-farmer, dispute his hand. A recruiting party, with Sergeant Lespérut, enter the valley to carry off a certain number of conscripts: but Stephan's name is drawn. Rose de Mai is in despair. She expects to receive through Jacques, a kind of Eau de valeree, a certain amount of money, and, as time presses, she is tempted to take from her mistress's desk the sum to buy Stephan off. Through some contrariety, Jacques returns minus the money, and Rose de Mai is accused before the syndics, or Elders of the Valley, of domestic theft, a crime punishable with death, denounced by Thereza through jealousy. When it comes to the trial, Thereza abandons, to the astonishment of all, the accusation, and declares that she has calumniated Rose de Mai, but, in a quatuor, the latter is claimed as the child of Thereza, who consents to the union of Rose de Mai with Stephan. There is a very droll underplot of the love of Saturnin for Georgette, the scenes relieving the serious interest of the drama.

"Le Val d'Andorre" was completely successful, thanks to an excellent orchestra, Mdlle Charton, and above all to Chollet. This admirable singer and comedian was for years the attraction of the Opera Comique in Paris. He was the original Pea Darnels, Zampa, and Brasseur de Preston. He is a most consummate comedian, full of finesse, vivacity, and spirit. His vocal powers, albeit not what they have been, for he is a veteran, are still managed with tact and taste. His "Chanson Militaire," in the third act, was earnestly encored. His accent and affectation in the military dandy were inimitable. M. Xavier was Jacques, M. Lac Stephan, M. Leroy the peasant Saturnin. Mdlle Cotti was lively in Georgette, and Mdme. Gulchard judicious in Thersa. As the opera is more frequently played, the ensemble will be more complete; at present, the choral portion is the weakest. Halévy in his early operas was regarded, and with some justice, as an imitator of Meyerbeer; but his compositions are now peculiarly his own, and are completely opposed to the school of Auber. This impress of individuality, which Halévy possesses in an eminent degree, puzzles amateurs, who are but superficially acquainted with his forms and style. In the "Val d'Andorre," Halévy, with the greatest skill, has given a local colouring; his instrumentation is peculiarly rich and varied, and is a treat of itself to follow. The opening air of Jacques, with the drone bass, is quaint, clever, and original. The airs assigned to Rose de Mai are full of character. The finale of the first act is picturesque; that of the second, broad and dramatic. The trial scene is a fine conception, and the quatuor is full of genius. There can be no surprise felt at the popularity of the "Val d'Andorre" in Paris: its poem is replete with serious and comic situation of the greatest interest, and the music is indicative that the imagination of the composer is fertile in invention, with a thorough knowledge of his art.

THE NEW OLYMPIC THEATRE.

IN our Journal of December 29 we recorded the opening of this New Theatre, which has risen, phœnix-like, from the ashes of the old house, destroyed by fire in March last; and felicitously referred to in the opening Address, a clever jeu de circonstance from the pen of Mr. Albert Smith.

The New Theatre has the form of an elongated horse-shoe, with but few projections, so as not to present any interruptions to sight or sound.

The Pit Seats are circular in plan, so that each person looks directly to the centre of the stage. The ceiling and proscenium are match boarded, and canvassed for decorations. The height from the Pit floor to the highest part of the ceiling is about 36 feet. The Stalls contain 38 sittings; the Pit will hold from 800 to 850 persons, the Boxes about 200, and the Gallery 700 to 750. The decorations were entrusted to Mr. Agllo, and executed conjointly by him and his son. The ceiling is divided into four compartments, representing the Seasons —each compartment being separated by ornamental designs in the Arabesque style, connected in the centre in an ornament, giving apparent support to the chandelier. The front of the gallery and box tiers is divided into seven compartments, by the gilded and bronzed columns supporting the boxes and gallery. Each compartment in the gallery tier is decrated with arabesque ornaments, within which are introduced masks, musical instruments, and cameos, in chiaroscuro, on gold ground. The proscenium is intended simply to form a frame to the decorations of the stage. The decorations were designed and painted in the short space of seven weeks. The stage and machinery were designed and executed by E. J. Strachan, the well-known stage-machinist, who, as he tells us, has designed and constructed the machinery of eight of the principal London theatres. The front of the house is lighted by a large chandelier, manufactured by Mr. Apsley Pellatt. The gas-fittings were put up by Mr. J. Palmer, jun., and present several useful precautionary measures. The exact cost of the theatre has not been arrived at, but it is stated by the architect, Mr. F. W. Bushill, as under £10,000, including the cost of purchasing some adjoining property. The act drop, representing an "Italian loggia opening on a cortile," was painted by Messrs. Dayes and Gordon, and is a very creditable work.

We quote these details from the Builder, wherein also are given some instances of construction peculiarly adapted to secure the safety and comfort of the audience. Among these are two fire-proof (stone) staircases to the gallery, one for entrance and both for exit. There are also two ways out of the pit, and separate way from stalls and boxes—so that the house may be cleared in a few minutes. The whole of the entrances, passages, &c., including staircases (slate) to the private boxes and slips, are fire-proof.

Among the commendable points of management before the curtain of this theatre is the abolition of all fees to attendants, who present gratuitously to each visitor to the boxes, stalls, and pit, a bill of the night's performances. The gratuity system, at the best, insures but an ad valorem degree of civility; and we hope soon to see it forbidden in all our places of amusement.

INTERIOR OF THE NEW OLYMPIC THEATRE, STRAND.

JEROME BONAPARTE.

THE ex-King Jérome has just been raised to the dignity of Marshal of France, by the following decree inserted in the Moniteur:—

"The President of the Republic—Considering the law of August 4, 1839: Considering that, by the effect of the law of October 11, 1848, the General of Division, Jérome Bonaparte, was restored to the plenitude of his rights as a Frenchman, and as a general officer belonging to the active service list: Considering that, during the campaigns of 1807, 1809, and 1812, that General exercised, in virtue of Imperial decrees, the command in chief, before the enemy, of corps d'armée composed of several divisions of different arms: That in 1813, and later in 1815, on the field of battle of Waterloo, he was again at the head of a division of the army, and was one of the last to return his sword to its scabbard when the enemy invaded France: On the report of the Minister of War, come to in a Council of Ministers, decrees: Art. 1. The General of Division Jérome Bonaparte is raised to the dignity of Marshal of France; Art. 2. The Minister of War is charged with the execution of the present decree.—Done at the Elysée National, the 1st Jan., 1850.—The President of the Republic, LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.—(Countersigned) D'HAUTPOUL, Minister of War."

To these official data it may be interesting to add an outline of Jérome's eventful life.

Jérome Napoleon Bonaparte, the youngest of the brothers of Napoleon, was born at Ajaccio, in the island of Corsica, on the 15th of November, 1784. He was educated in the college of Juilly, in France, which, after the departure of his brother for Egypt, he left, in order to enter the Marines. In 1801, he accompanied his brother-in-law, Le Clerc, in the expedition to St. Domingo, in quality of Lieutenant, and soon afterwards returned to France with the despatches of that General, when he was appointed to the command of L'Epervier frigate, in which he sailed to Martinique. Driven from his cruising station here by English vessels, he touched at the North American coast, and there, in 1803, married a Miss Elizabeth Patterson, the daughter of a Baltimore merchant. When the young couple came to Europe, in 1805, Napoleon would not receive the bride as a member of the Imperial family; and at length, but without opposition on the part of the young sailor, the marriage was annulled, after one or two children had been born.

Shortly after, when Napoleon was in Italy, Jérome repaired to Genoa, and there received orders to demand of the Dey of Algiers the Genoese who were detained in slavery; and he brought back the captives, 250 in number. Napoleon sent Jérome to Brest, and gave him the command of a 74-gun ship, one of a squadron sent to Martinique; and in the spring of that year, Jérome was raised to the rank of Rear-Admiral. Napoleon was, however, disappointed in his brother's naval qualifications, and he soon transferred his services to land, by appointing him to the command of a corps of Bavarians and Wurtembergers, in Silesia, and he afterwards attained the rank of General of Division.

In 1808, Jérome had the kingdom of Westphalia created for him, out of certain Prussian and Hessian provinces, and other fragments of the dissolved German empire; and he received a Royal bride, in the Princess Katharine, the daughter of the King of Wurtemberg, taking up his residence at Cassel. He continued an unpopular system of government until the war with Russia, when, by order of his brother, he was put at the head of a French division. He at first led with some success, but was afterwards surprised by the enemy, in consequence of which Napoleon sharply rebuked him, and sent him back to Cassel.

The remainder of his career is thus short, but in an able paper on "the Bonaparte Family," in the North British Review, No. 21 :—

"Retaining nominally the Crown of Westphalia, even after the disastrous result of the Russian campaign, in which he took so conspicuous a part, he was obliged finally to resign it in 1814, receiving from his father-in-law the title of Prince de Montfort. Flying to his brother's side in 1815, he held a command at Waterloo; joined it was fatal to that cause. Napoleon left the task of collecting the wreck of the French army after the defeat. On his brother's deportation to St. Helena, Jérome rejoined his wife in Wurtemberg, where, shielded by her affection against the bad or the cruel nature of her own father, he would willingly have separated her from a man so fallen in fortune, he continued to reside for some years in comparative wealth and comfort, as a German nobleman and landowner. He was able to purchase property in Italy and in Switzerland, in both of which countries he occasionally resided after 1822. In 1835 he lost his excellent and devoted wife, who died at Lausanne, leaving three children—two sons and a daughter. The daughter was married (1841) to the Russian Count Demidoff; the elder son died in 1847, leaving the title of Prince de Montfort to his brother Napoleon-Paul."

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

YORK, NEWCASTLE, AND BERWICK.—COMPROMISE WITH MR. HUDSON.—A special general meeting of this company was held on Tuesday in the De Grey Rooms, York, called by the directors, to consider, first, an arrangement with the directors of the Great North of England Company, extending the time for payment of the purchase-money of that line; and, secondly, an agreement or compromise between the new directors and Mr. Hudson, by which all legal proceedings taken against that gentleman were to be abandoned on his paying a stipulated sum to the company. The meeting was pretty numerously attended. A resolution confirming the first arrangement having been agreed to, the Chairman explained the terms of agreement with Mr. Hudson. By the substance of it was, that in respect of all matters for which bills in equity were to be filed, the company should receive the sum of £50,000; and the £41,000 which had been paid out of the funds of the company for 2,245 shares of the Sunderland Docks was to be refunded to this company, £15,000 of it being taken to pay the last instalment due on the 3000 shares they had agreed to take, and that the remaining £26,039 10s. be paid to the company. In the meantime, these shares, which now stood in the name of Mr. Hudson and some of his friends, were to be transferred to the directors as security for the payment of the money; and in still further security, the directors were to have placed in their hands the title-deeds of unencumbered landed property, which, together with the shares, the directors believed would secure to the company the payment of the money. Besides these sums, there were other claims of the company on Mr. Hudson, which were to be paid in full. There was a note of hand which he owed the company, which was nearly due; there were calls due on certain shares, all of which were to be paid up; and the dividends which stood due to Mr. Hudson on a great number of shares would be applied in the manner named; so that the shareholders would perceive the amount of money now to be received from Mr. Hudson exceeded the sum of £100,080. The shareholders were reminded that during the past year the labours of the committees had added £90,000 to the coffers of the company upwards of £90,000, and the sums now to be received would exceed £100,000 more. Mr. Hudson was to pay all expenses incurred in the proceedings. A resolution confirming and adopting this arrangement was passed, after some discussion, in the course of which an amendment was negatived.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN.—The inhabitants of Warwick propose to hold a meeting to take into consideration the propriety of memorialising the directors of the London and North-Western, to open the Rugby and Leamington Railway with all practicable expedience.

SAMBRE AND MEUSE, JAN. 10.—Half-yearly Meeting: London. W. P. Richards, Esq., in the chair.—The report stated that such arrangements had been made with the Belgian Government for increasing the tariff on the line, as would, it was believed, have the effect, combined with the strictest economy, of giving a small profit on the working. The directors had entered into a provisional agreement, subject to the approval of the shareholders, by which the company were to give up all their claims on the contractors, amounting to about £24,000, and surrender to them a third of their shares, with £16 paid, as though they were paid up full, the contractors abandoning the remainder of their contract, by which £30,000 or £40,000 might be saved to the company. The directors thought it would be desirable to raise a further sum of £60,000 to complete the line to Vireux, without which it could not be expected to pay any fair amount of profit. The report was adopted; but the agreement with the contractors was referred to the directors for further negotiation, the shareholders objecting to giving the shares up to the contractors as long as they were paid in full. It was also resolved to apply to the Belgian Government for a guarantee of five per cent. on the £200,000 proposed to be expended on the extension line to Vireux. The meeting then separated.

LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY.—The directors have decided to recommend a dividend of 4s. per £100 of consolidated stock for the past half-year, after laying aside £15,000 towards a reserve fund, as notified in their last half-yearly report.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—A jury have just made their award for compensation in respect of land required by this company in the construction of their Coventry and Oxford line. The claim was for the sum of £9578, and the jury awarded £1800; in the second case the claim was £6843, and the jury awarded £1930.

MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH THE SOUTH OF IRELAND.—The arbitrator, Jonathan Henn, Esq., to whom the question of compensation for the carriage of the mails to Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, by the Great Southern and Western Railway, was referred, has decided upon granting the company 4s. 6d. per mile for the night mail, and 3s. per mile for the day mail. It will amount to upwards of £40,000. The cost of carriage by mail coach under the old régime was £13,000 a mile.

OXFORD, WORCESTER, AND WOLVERHAMPTON.—Memorials have just been presented by Lord Redesdale, on behalf of the inhabitants of various places on the route of this railway, to the Commissioners of Railways, urging upon them to compel the immediate resumption and completion of the works on this line.

LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE.—The Barnsley branch of this company's line was opened on Tuesday last. It passes through the largest coal-fields in the country.

SOUTH WALES.—The section of this company's line, from Chepstow to Swansea, is to be opened in April next.

RAILWAYS OPENED IN 1849.—It appears that the aggregate length of English railways opened for traffic in the year 1849 is 262 miles; of Scotch railways 73½ miles; and of Irish railways, 114 miles—making the aggregate length of railways opened in the United Kingdom during the past year 937 miles, being 370 miles less in extent than the railways opened during the year 1848.

RATING OF RAILWAYS.—At the Macclesfield petty sessions, on Monday, it was decided that an assessment on the London and North-Western line, in that township, should be reduced from £1000 to £50 per mile; and on the station, from £500 to £112. Another appeal of the same company, against an assessment of £200 per mile in Adlington, was compromised by the overseers consenting to reduce the amount to £30 per mile.

EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.—From a survey of this company's line in the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, it appears that the assessment of the railway has been increased from £3760 to £7500, against which an appeal is about to be made at the approaching Middlesex sessions.

SHREWSBURY AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—The traffic receipts on this line are, notwithstanding the low fares, said to be about £430 per week. The line is thirty miles in length, and was opened throughout on the 12th of November last.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC AND THE CHOLERA.—From a comparison of the aggregate amount of traffic on railways in the United Kingdom between the 22nd of August and the 3rd of November, 1849, with the traffic of the corresponding period of preceding years, it has been estimated that the falling off in the traffic, in consequence of the cholera at that period, amounted to £155,000. In the week ending the 29th of August, the falling off amounted to £5000; the week ending the 5th of September, to £7000; 12th of September, to £9000; 19th of September, to £25,000; 22nd of September, to £30,000; 29th of September, to £7000; 6th of October, to £20,000; 13th of October, £13,000; 20th of October, £6000; and 27th of October, £5000. The greatest decrease in the receipts of this traffic was lost, because there is no corresponding increase shown in the traffic during the remainder of the year to make up the deficiency. In addition to this, the traffic on the northern lines of railway was extensively reduced, for several months prior to the period mentioned, from the same cause. We are not for that deficiency, the aggregate amount of the railway traffic for the year 1849 would have amounted to £11,168,800, instead of to £11,013,800.

The British Beneficent Institution has been joined by Sir R. P. Jodrell, Bart., Sir C. R. Price, Bart., Lord Skelmersdale, Sir James Bathurst, Lord Leigh, Colonel Lindsey, M.P., Viscount and Viscountess Seaham, Jame W. Freshfield, Esq., and Sir C. Throckmorton, Bart.

The committee appointed to conduct the case of the Rev. James Shore, on the prosecution of the Bishop of Exeter, have just brought their labours to a close: the total amount placed at their disposal by the public was £514 1s. 7d., of this amount, £330 19s. 10d. (including £310 16s. 4d., paid to the Bishop of Exeter, the cost or the proceedings in the Court of Arches) has been expended; and the balance, £86 8s. 9d. handed over to Mr. Shore.

At the Custom House of Newcastle, last week, Messrs. Redpathmann, Borries, and Co., reported the Swedish vessel Dube, Captain M. Lundahl, from Riga, with a cargo of timber. This is the first vessel, arrived in the Tyne which comes under the regulations of the New Navigation Act.

At Tunbridge the roof of the Free School burst into flames between one and two o'clock on Saturday morning last. The dormitories were under repair, and the scholars being absent, the fire is supposed to have originated from the carelessness of the workmen. It was nearly an hour before water could be obtained. By three o'clock, Dr. Wheldon, the master, assisted by his inhabitants, succeeded in extinguishing the flames, which were confined to three of the attics. The loss is estimated at £300.

IRELAND.

THE PROTECTION MOVEMENT.—The address to the Queen, prepared by the committee of which Lord Gisgnal is chairman, now bears the signatures of 54 Peers, 22 Members of Parliament, 23 Baronets, 111 Lieutenants, together with the signatures of magistrates, clergymen, barristers, doctors, attorneys, merchants, and tenant-farmers.

THE GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS OF DESIGN.—A letter from the Board of Trade states, that their Lordships object to the admission of affluent persons into the Government Schools of Design, unless at rates of payment equal to those usually charged by private drawing-masters.

CORK SCHOOL OF DESIGN.—This institution was formally opened on Monday. The president, James Roche, Esq., took the chair. An inaugural address was delivered by Mr. Wills, the principal of the school. The Mayor of Cork, Sir Thomas Lyons, and Mr. James Roche, M.P., generally addressed the assembly.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE, GALWAY.—Mr. Edward Berwick is promoted to the presidency of Galway College, vacant by the death of the Rev. Mr. Kirwan. The present president is Father O'Toole, late Professor of Logic in the Irish College at Paris.

EARLY CLOSING IN DUBLIN.—A very praiseworthy movement on this head, in following the example of London, was commenced last week, when a meeting of drapers' assistants was held, and resolutions agreed to, for effecting the object of obtaining from their employers reasonable time for instruction and recreation.

LITERARY ASSOCIATION.—On Monday, Mr. John O'Connell took the opportunity to reiterate his determination to retire from English Parliamentary life. The rent for the week was £14 4s. 9d.

IRON SHIPBUILDING IN CORK.—Mr. Pike is building an immense iron vessel at his Irish ship-building yard, Hargrave's-quay. She is intended for the New York trade when completed, which it is expected will be in June next, and is to be commanded by an experienced mariner, a native of Cork.—Captain Hall. This vessel will be steam propelled, and her tonnage is computed at 1400 tons.

PRICE OF MEAT.—A blow is aimed at the monopoly of butchers in their unreasonable prices of meat in Dublin. Some large consumers, it is ascertained, have with success entered into an agreement of contracting with butchers in a distant part of the county, by which they have, at the price of 3½d. per lb., as good beef and mutton as they can purchase in Dublin for 6d.

EMIGRATION.—The number of emigrants who embarked from Galway during the year ended 31st of December, 1849, amounted to 1956 males, 1523 females, with 144 cabin passengers: in all, 3624. From Belfast the numbers have been:—1847, 16,242; 1848, 19,290; increase in 1848, 3,048. Emigrants who have embarked from Dublin for the United States in the quarter ending 31st December, 1849:—Cabin passengers, 19; steerage, 724; children, 284: total, 1027.

SUNDAY LABOUR IN THE POST-OFFICE.—The following notice has been issued, by command of the Postmaster-General:—"On and after Sunday, the 13th inst., all post-offices in England and Wales will be closed to the public on Sunday from ten A.M. to the remainder of the day; except in those cases where the delivery commences between nine and ten A.M., when the office must continue open for one hour after the letter-carriers are despatched; and except also in those cases where the delivery commences later than ten A.M., when the office, having been closed as in A.M., must be re-opened for one hour after the despatch of the letter-carriers. On and after the same date no inland letters will be received on the Sunday except such as are prepaid by stamps or unpaid, for the deposit of which the letter-box will be open as usual throughout the day. Until the closing of the office at ten A.M., or during the subsequent hour after the dispatch of the letter-carriers, foreign letters may be prepaid, postage stamps may be obtained, and letters may be registered on payment of the usual registration fee; strangers, renters of private boxes, and those who reside beyond the limits of the letter carriers' deliveries, may also, while the office is open, obtain their letters at the office window. Except at the times above mentioned, no letters or newspapers can be delivered from the office on Sunday."

THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION.—The appointment of Assistant-Secretary to the Committee of Council on Education, vacated by the resignation of Sir James Kay Shuttleworth, Bart., is conferred by her Majesty in Council on Ralph R. W. Lingen, Esq., who has been performing the duties of Acting Assistant-Secretary to the Committee.

WESTMINSTER IMPROVEMENTS.—Mr Alderman Musgrove, the chairman of the committee of governors of Emanuel Hospital, having recently visited the Asylum for Idiots, made an application to Parliament, in the ensuing session, for amending and enlarging the powers of the Westminster Improvement Acts of the years 1845 and 1847, and to authorise the formation of new street, from Victoria-street to Buckingham Palace, and for the compulsory purchase of land for that purpose. Nothing has been taken place upon this subject. It appears that the Westminster Improvement Commissioners will require, in furtherance of the object, a large portion of the Emanuel Hospital property to be used for improvements. The governors of the hospital have dissented from the measure, under the impression that, if the property be at all interfered with, the whole of it ought to be taken, and an establishment for the reception of Queen Margaret's Parish, for treating for a portion of the hospital property for a site for a new asylum, the erection of which in that district is contemplated. This charity consists of twenty in-pensioners and two out-pensioners, and of sixty children, who are wholly maintained and educated on the foundation. The asylum for idiots is being selected from the parishes in the city of Westminster, from Chelsea, and Hayes, in Middlesex, from the city of London, and from Brandsburton, in Yorkshire, where the estates for its support are situated.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Consols register an advance of ¼ per cent., having during the week marked 1 per cent. improvement upon the preceding week's prices. Monday being the first transfer day, Money Stock became more plentiful, and Consols closed at 97. An advance of about ¼ per cent. was quoted on Tuesday, and on Wednesday an additional ¼ per cent. advance was quoted. Realising, however, on Thursday, slightly checked the party for the rise, Consols receding to 97½. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents have been bought and sold at 99½ this guarantee against any reduction below three per cent. until after 1878, rendering them a favourite stock with parties who credit the rumour of a reduction in the interest of Consols, which, as before observed in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, is in the best quarters, believed to be a mere stock-jobbing report. The currency by the parties at present interested for the rise. Exchequer Bills maintain their high quotations, the premium being greater than the whole year's interest on the bills. India Bonds, also, continue firm. The firmness of these foreign securities still indicate that, as far as the public are concerned, Consols are not regarded as a good investment, at the present price, during the still uncertain state of Continental affairs. The superfluous amount of money has induced Messrs. Overend and Co., the celebrated bill-brokers, to give notice of a reduction in the rate of interest to 1½ per cent. on all money left "at call." This, again, favours the speculators, who, by borrowing money at this low rate, look forward the accounts they cannot close; added to which, the public usually invest a certain proportion of their dividends. At the close of the week there was rather less doing:—Bank Stock, 209; Reduced, 97½; Consols, 97½; Consols, 97¾; New 3½ per Cent. Annuities, 99½; Long Annuities, to expire Jan. 1860, 8 9-16; India Stock, 265; India Bonds, £1000, 101 pm.; Ditto, under £1000, 97 pm.; South Sea Stock, 92½; South Sea Annuities, 97; Bank Stock for account, 209; Consols for Account, 97½; India Stock for Account, 266; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 62 pm.; Ditto, £500, June, 62 pm.; Ditto, Small, June, 62 pm.

The Foreign Market has been buoyant, Peruvian and Buenos Ayres registering an advance, nearly all the other descriptions of foreign investment also showing improvement. Peruvian quotes 63; Buenos Ayres, 49. Russian Stock has also improved, quoting 110 to 111. Mexican has not materially varied. At the close of the week prices stood—Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 65; Ditto, New, 64½ and 63½; Buenos Ayres Bonds, Six per Cent., 49; Danish Bonds, 1825, Three per Cent., 73; Ditto, Five per Cent., 101; Equador Bonds, 3½; Mexican, Five per Cents., 1846, Ex. Jan. Coupons, 29½; Ditto, Account, 29½; Peruvian Bonds, Four per Cent., 63; Ditto, Deferred, 21; Portuguese, Four per Cent., 37; Venezuela Bonds, Two-and-a-Quarter per Cent., Deferred, 10; Belgian, Four-and-a-Half per Cents., 89½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 12 Guild., 8/-; Ditto, Account, 56; Ditto, Four per Cent., Certificates, 86¾.

Shares have fluctuated, and in some instances a rise has been maintained. This may be instanced in the case of the South-Western, Brighton, Midland, and North-Westerns. The following are the closing prices of the lines last dealt in:—Aberdeen, Preference, 1 dis.; Bristol and Exeter, 58, Buckinghamshire, 7¾; Caledonian, 10¾; Ditto, New £10 Pref., 8; Eastern Counties, 7¾; Ditto, New, Guaranteed Six per Cent., 1½; Ditto, Three per Cent., 1½; Great N. U. Shares Scrip, Six per Cent., 17¾; Great Northern, 78; Do., Five per Cent. Pref., 10¾; Great West., 59¾; Do., Half Shares, 28; Do., Qr. Shares, 13¾; Do., Fifths, 10½; Ditto, New, £17, 7; Hull and Selby, 97; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 69; Leased and Guaranteed Six per Cent., 12¾; London and Blackwall, 3¾; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 79¾; Ditto, New, £5, Guaranteed Six per Cent., 13⅞; London and North Western, 104; London and South-Western, 70¾; Ditto, New Quarters, 13; Ditto, Fifths, 13; London and South-Western, 63; Midland, 44; Ditto, Consd. Pref. £50 Shares, 7¼; Ditto, Birmingham and Derby, 20; Ditto, Consolidated Bristol and Birmingham, 50 per Cent., 1291; North British, Pref., 5¾; North Staffordshire, 7¾; Reading, Guildford, and Reigate, 15¾; Scottish Midland, 1¼; South Staffordshire, 5; South-Eastern, No. 2, 14¾; Ditto, No. 3, 18¾; Wear Valley, 5 per Cent. Guaranteed, 5; York, Newcastle, and Berwick (Newcastle Extension), 11; Ditto, G.N.E. Preference, 2¾; York and North Midland, 18; Boulogne and Amiens, 7¾; Central of France (Orleans and Vierzon), 13⅝; Luxembourg, 2¾; Namur and Liege, 1¾; Northern of France, 1⅝ dis.; Orleans and Bordeaux, 3¾; Paris and Rouen, 3½; Paris and Strasbourg, 6¾; Rouen and Havre, 10.

SATURDAY MORNING.—Consols were rather flatter yesterday, with a less amount of business doing; the price during the day fluctuated between 97⅞ to 97½, which was the last quotation. In the Foreign house, Mexican was firm, upon an extensive purchase, and shares did not materially vary.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Up to our market this week, coastwise, the receipts of English wheat have exceeded 3000 quarters; but those by land carriage and sample have been very moderate. No show of wheat of home produce on offer, to-day, was reasonably good. After a stagnation of both town and country millers was limited, the demand for all descriptions ruled dull in the extreme, at almost nominal currencies. The imports of foreign wheat have amounted to 5200 quarters. Really fine parcels were more or less dull at full prices; but the middling and inferior kinds were somewhat lower to purchase. We had a good supply of barley on offer; all kinds were a very slow sale, at barely last week's currencies. Increased supplies of malt were on show. All kinds were very dull, and the turn in favour of the buyer. The quantity of oats was fair. The samples were scarce and quite as dear. All other kinds were much neglected. In beans, peas, Indian corn, and flour, exceedingly little business was transacted.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 3110 quarters; barley, 5690; malt, 5760; oats, 3180; beans, 3480; flour, 3480. Irish: Wheat, —; barley, —; oats, 600. Foreign: Wheat, 5280 quarters; barley, 6000; malt, —; oats, 4940; Flour: — sacks. Malt, — qrs.

Wheat.—English: Essex and Kent, red, 38s to 42s; ditto, new, 42s to 44s; Northern and Suffolk, red, 35s to 41s; ditto, white, 42s to 45s; rye, 32s to 34s; grinding barley, 22s to 23s; distilling ditto, 25s to 26s; malting ditto, 26s to 28s. Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 52s to 56s; brown ditto, 46s to 48s; Kingston and Ware, 54s to 57s; Chevalier, 57s to 58s. Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 15s to 16s; potato ditto, 18s to 21s; Youghal and Cork, black, 15s to 16s; ditto, white, 14s to 16s; tick beans, 29s to 31s; ditto, old, 32s to 34s; grey peas, 28s to 29s; maple, 27s to 29s; white, 27s to 28s; boilers, 29s to 31s, per quarter. Town-used flour, 35s to 40s; Suffolk, 32s to 33s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 30s to 33s, per 280 lbs.

Foreign: Dantzig red wheat, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; barley, s to —s; oats, —s to —s; beans, —s to —s; peas, —s to —s; per quarter. Flour, American, 19s to 24s per barrel; Baltic, —s to —s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—For all kind of seeds, as well as oakum, the demand has ruled heavy during the whole of the week, and prices have had a downward tendency.

LINSEED, English, sowing, 54s to 56s; Baltic, crushing, 38s to 40s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 42s to 44s; hempseed, 32s to 34s per quarter; coleseed, 24s to 26s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 8s to 11s; white do, 6s 6d to 8s 6d; tares, 4s 6d to 4s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £20 to £20 per last of ten quarters; linseed cakes, English, £5 10s to £10 0s; ditto, foreign, £6 0s to £8 0s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £4 5s to £4 10s per ton; canary, 50s to 56s per quarter; hempseed, 36s to 38s; English carraway seed, 24s to 26s; extra, —s to —s; coriander, 22s to 24s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 6½d to 7d; of household ditto, 5d to 6d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 40s 0d; barley, 26s 11d; oats, 15s 10d; rye, 31s 11d; beans, 32s 11d; peas, 32s 5d.

Aggregate Average.—Wheat, 39s 6d; barley, 26s 7d; oats, 15s 6d; rye, 32s 8d; beans, 32s 6d; peas, 32s 3d.

Duties per Imperial Quarter.—Wheat, 1s 0d; barley, 1s 0d; oats, 1s 0d; rye, 1s 0d; beans, 1s 0d; peas, 1s 0d.

HOP.—The hop business has been done in common sound Congous, at 10½d to 11d per lb. Common Twankays have commanded rather more money. In the value of other kinds of tea we have no alteration to notice.

Sugar.—The demand for all kinds of colonial sugar has ruled very steady this week, at an increase in the quotations of 6d per cwt. Foreign sugars have produced very full prices. Refined goods have moved slowly; grocery lumps, on the spot, have sold at 40 6s 6d; and fair grocery, 40s to 40s per cwt. Rough ditto, steady.

Coffee.—The public sales of Coffee have been again brief. Native Ceylons nearly 2s.000 bags have changed hands, at 56s to 62s 6d per cwt. Plantation and most other kinds are in to 2s per cwt lower terms.

Butter and Cheese.—

Rice.—As the dealers are mostly short of stock, the demand has improved, and prices have risen 2s per cwt.

Provisions.—Dutch butter is very dull in sale, and somewhat lower to purchase. Fine Finland is selling at 86s to 94s; and middling and surplus, 80s to 70s per cwt. Fine Irish butter supports late rates; but the inferior descriptions are dull. Bacon dealers are on the turn. Carlow, 72s landed, 72s to 80s; Clonmel and Kilkenny, 70s to 76s; Cork, 70s to 72s. Waterford, 68s to 70s; and Limerick, 68s to 70s per cwt. Fresh cuts are very dull. A few sales have taken place on board. Fine English butter is firm, and quite as dear, with very small supplies on offer. Other kinds are dull. Mild cures are dull. Inferior, 54s to 56s per cwt.; fresh, 8s to 12s per dozen lbs. Very little is doing in Irish bacon, owing to the progress on the part of the holders. Waterford, middle, landed, 47s to 47s, and heavy, 45s to 42s per cwt. Small Hamburg bacon, 40s to 42s; and American, 34s to 36s per cwt. No change in lard worth notice. Irish hams are lower.

Tallow.—Our market is flat, owing to heavy arrivals, and prices are barely supported. P Y C on the spot, is selling at 38s to 38s 6d; and, for forward delivery, 38s per cwt. Town tallow, 36s 6d to 36s 9d per cwt; rough fat, 2s.

Oils.—Linseed oil has further improved 2s per ton. Otherwise, the market is inactive.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 15s to £5 15s; clover ditto, £4 5s to £5 15s; and straw, £1 3s to £1 8s per load.

Coals.—The demand for Hartley coals continues steady, at fully last week's prices. Fine Jamaica rum is in fair request, and quite as dear, but all other qualities are very dull. No change in Geneva; fine grain spirits are held per gallon lower.

Wool.—Privately, the demand is steady, and late rates are well supported.

Potatoes.—Prime qualities are in good request, at 90s to 120s per ton. In other kinds, very little alteration is noticed.

Coals (Friday).—Holywell Main, 16s 6d; Ord's Hedbeugh, 14s; Tanfield Moor, 13s 6d; Hetton, 16s 6d; Lambton, 17s 9d; Hilton, 17s 3d per ton.

Hops (Friday).—We have to report a decided improvement in the demand for most kinds of hops during the week, and prices are quite 10s per cwt. dearer than at the corresponding period last week. The show of samples is comparatively small, and the holders generally are firm.

Wool (Friday).—Prices of Down qualities are from 1s to 2s per lb. dearer. New Season ditto, £5 15s to £6 15s; New Farmhams, £4 0s to £10 0s. New Kent and Sussex ditto, £5 15s to £6 15s; New Southdowns, £4 0s to £5 0s. Yearling ditto, £3 5s to £4 5s. Yearling Scotch, £3 0s to £3 17s; Old Hops, £1 0s to £4 0s

Smithfield (Friday).—Notwithstanding the large supply of beasts here to-day was small, and the weather favourable for slaughtering, the beef trade was in a sluggish state, at Monday's prices, and the demand for sheep was quite unchanged. Veals and pigs ruled very dull, and were barely supported. The supply of calves was very limited. With sheep we were scantily supplied; nevertheless, the demand for that description of stock was inactive, at the currencies we have to report. Prime Scots were in average supply and a slow inquiry, at last week's currencies. Prime small porkers produced full prices. Inferior sorts moved slowly, at 4d per 8lb lower than last week. The general demand arose chiefly from the large supplies of country slaughtered meat received up to the time of the Christmas market. Very little business was doing, at from £14 to £18 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lb to sink the offal:—Coarse and middling beasts, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime large oxen, 3s 10d to 4s 0d, prime Scots, &c., 4s 0d to 4s 2d; coarse and inferior cows, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; prime ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime South Down ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; prime small ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; large hogs, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; neat small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; sucking calves, 3s to 3s 8d; and quarter old store pigs, 18s to 23s each. Total supply:—Beasts, 330; cows, 110; sheep, 3400; calves, 120; pigs, 200. Foreign supplies:—Beasts, 27; sheep, 40; calves, —; pigs, —. Scotch: Sheep, —.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—These markets were well supplied to-day. Generally speaking the demand ruled heavy, on the following terms:—

Per 8lb by the carcase.—Inferior beef, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; middling ditto, 3s 10d to 3s 0d; prime large ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; prime small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large pork, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; inferior mutton, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 4d to 3s 10d; small pork, 3s 6d to 4s 0d.

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIAN

THE ST. MARYLEBONE BATHS AND WASHHOUSES.

THIS establishment has just been erected in the New-road, opposite Lisson-grove, and immediately adjoining the District County Court. The design consists of one façade, in the Italian style, with rusticated stone basement; the upper story being of red brick, with stone quoins and window-dressings, cornice, &c. The whole has a frontage of about 160 feet, of which the Baths and Wash-houses have 100 feet, with a depth of about 230 feet, and are arranged in four departments, with separate entrances for the different classes and sexes. The front building comprises the check-clerks' offices and waiting-rooms, with the superintendent's dwelling-rooms over; together with a board-room and other conveniences. There are 107 separate baths—24 of the first class, and 57 of the second class, for men; 6 of the first class, and 20 of the second class, for women: the charges for a hot bath being 2d. and 6d., and for a cold bath 1d. and 2d., in each class respectively, each supplied with clean towels, looking-glass, and other suitable conveniences. There is also, in each class, a vapour and shower bath. There are likewise two large swimming baths, with a constant supply of tepid water, and dressing-boxes arranged around for first and second-class bathers.

The Wash-houses are not quite completed; they will contain 89 separate pairs of wash-tubs and boilers, supplied with hot and cold water, and with a drying-closet to each compartment, and arranged in two classes. There is also a large ironing-room, plentifully supplied with hot irons. The whole establishment is spacious, well lighted, and ventilated by means of a lofty shaft (seen in our View), which also makes a good feature in the general effect of the building; and will, when completed, accommodate 5000 persons daily. It does great credit to the skill and ingenuity of the architect, Mr. C. Eales, under whose direction the whole has been executed; and bears testimony to the public spirit of the Vestry in adopting the Act of Parliament and carrying it out so liberally—the cost being about £30,000, including the freehold site.

GIACINTO ACHILLI, D.D.

(WHEN PRIOR OF A DOMINICAN CONVENT, IN NAPLES.)

DR. ACHILLI was born at Viterbo in 1803; he took the Dominican habit in his native town at the early age of sixteen; and in the year 1821 he was ordained a priest at Lucca, where he enjoyed the marked favour of the reigning Duke. He soon returned to Viterbo, where his talents, his learning, his eloquence, and his winning manners gained him universal esteem. The Vicar-General of the province placed the utmost confidence in him, and he was speedily raised to a position of trust in the Dominican order. In 1826 he was appointed Public Professor of Philosophy in the Lyceum; and he was also the first to fill the chair of Sacred Scripture in the seminary of Theology—a professorship which he had himself been the means of founding—thus early evincing that love of the word of God which eventually led to his separation from the Church of Rome. In 1833, he quitted Viterbo, carrying with him the goodwill and affection of all his countrymen, and proceeded to Rome, having been elected Regent or Prefect of Studies and Primary Professor in the College of Minerva. He was then appointed Visitor of all the Convents of the Dominicans in the Roman and Tuscan States, an office which he held until the year 1835, when he went to Capua, and was soon after elected Prior of a Dominican convent at Naples: at this time his pulpit eloquence, and his discourses from the Professor's chair, attracted much attention, and a lithographed portrait was taken, from which our Engraving is copied.

It was at this period that he first became thoroughly convinced that the doctrine of Transubstantiation was not warranted by Scripture; and his preaching soon became so decidedly Protestant that he was speedily summoned to Rome, and confined in the Inquisition. He was treated with kindness, and all efforts were made to induce him to re-consider his position, and re-enter the communion of the church of which he had hitherto been an ornament. He was set at liberty, under surveillance, and soon contrived to escape to the Ionian Islands, where he at once wrote and published a letter to the late Pope, openly declaring himself a Protestant; this was in the year 1841. He subsequently held the appointment of Professor of Theology in the Malta Protestant College. In 1848 he came to England, where he remained until the flight of the Pope in the December of that year. This revolution, and the consequent religious liberty, induced him to return to Rome in February, 1849. During the whole period of the Republic he occupied himself in circulating copies of the Scriptures, and in receiving at his house the multitudes who thronged to him for explanation and instruction from morning until night. He did not preach openly, as the constitution granting perfect religious liberty had not yet been promulgated; and he carefully avoided taking any part in the political events which were occurring, although naturally sympathising with the Republic.

On the capture of the city by General Oudinot, he wrote to his friends that there was nothing to fear for him so long as the French flag waved: his mission had been so innocent and so unmixed with politics, that no one could touch him; of course, when the Pope returned he must quit Rome, but till then he was safe—religious persecution could never be allowed under the shadow of the banner of France!

He was soon undeceived. On the night of the 29th of July, at eleven o'clock, our sbirri or agents of secret police presented themselves at the Palazzetto Borghese, where he resided, and supported by a corporal's party of Chasseurs de Vincennes, arrested him in the name of the French Prefect of Police, Mons. de Rouxeau, and carried him off to the Inquisition, where he was placed in one of the foulest and dampest of their dungeons. The British Consul, Mr. Freeborn, exerted himself with his wonted generosity to obtain his release, but in vain. Dr. Achilli was a Roman subject and a Roman priest. Mr. Freeborn, however, succeeded in obtaining his removal to the Castle of St. Angelo, where he has remained closely confined, without permission to see or communicate with any friends. Meanwhile, a processo or secret trial has been going on, and is by this time concluded, and sentence perhaps pronounced; although the ill-used prisoner has not been even informed of what he is accused, nor examined or questioned in any form.

When the news of his arrest reached England, his numerous friends appealed to the French Government, who at once undertook to enquire into the matter. The Cardinals boldly asserted that he was not arrested for religion, but for dreadful crimes; and an "Abelard and Heloise" kind of a story respecting him was circulated throughout Europe.

Two of his most attached friends at once proceeded to Rome. Enquiries of a most searching character were instituted in Viterbo itself; the supposed crime had never been heard of, and Padre Achilli was remembered with the utmost respect and veneration. The Roman authorities now changed their ground: they boldly avowed that he was arrested, and should be punished for his apostacy as a priest and a friar; he was a Roman subject, and no foreign Power had a right to interfere. They denied all knowledge of the slanders they had circulated against him, and stood to the undoubted right of the Holy Office to try, to judge, and to punish him. His two friends in vain implored permission to see their suffering fellow-Protestant. General Baraguay d'Hilliers himself pressed this request on the Cardinal Vicar, but he referred it to the Pope, who sent an absolute refusal. Since then, a treacherous fellow-prisoner—the young protégé of the Pope and of Cardinal Lambruschini, who has been imprisoned for stealing some of the choicest medals in the Vatican collection—denounced him for having preached the Gospel to his fellow-prisoners; and orders were given to place him in the most rigid solitary confinement.

DR. GIACINTO ACHILLI.

So stands the affair of Dr. Achilli; and it now remains to be seen what part the French Government will take. Will they allow their name, their soldiers, and their flag to be employed in carrying out the secret, midnight acts of the "Holy Office?" General Baraguay d'Hilliers has exerted himself much in behalf of the prisoner; but, alas! the position of France is so utterly false that his hands have been hitherto tied. It is comforting, however, to Dr. Achilli's friends to know, that he has expressed the warmest personal interest in Dr. Achilli's fate, and that all will be done in the way of good offices that the peculiar position of the General will allow.

THE CORN EXCHANGE AND MARKET HALL, JUST ERECTED AT LICHFIELD.

LICHFIELD CORN EXCHANGE AND MARKET HALL.

AMONG the public buildings which have grown up of late in the ancient city of Lichfield, the Corn Exchange, Market Hall, and Savings-Bank may very truly be considered the most important and worthy of commemoration. The Market of Lichfield was originally granted by King Stephen, in 1161; and in a MS. in the British Museum, is an old sketch of the market-place, with the following account of the ancient cross built by Dean Deuton:—

"It was composed with 8 arches, supported with 8 pillars, of 8 squares. About 8 foote, on the two sides of this cross, towards the east and west, was annexed 2 crucifixes, about xviii or xx inches in length, very artificially cast in brass; on the top of the carved railes and banisters, being bound through with iron rods, was placed viii of our Saviour's Apostles, about iv foot in height, each carrying the emblem of their death, curiously carved to the life, in their several habets; and below them was cut in the stone the founder's coat of armes, (viz. back-girded saints), which piece of work cost the said Deane an cix pounds; which they utterly destroyed, because a Cross."

In 1652, a small market-house of brick was substituted, which was taken down in 1785, and a stone building erected by subscription. This edifice was hemmed in by small houses unhealthy to the locality; and which, being pulled down about sixteen years ago, left the market-house an unsightly ruin in the very centre of the city.

In 1848, John P. Dyott, jun., Esq., the present Mayor of Lichfield, formed the project of a Corn Exchange and Market Hall, and by his energy, and the co-operation of a company of gentlemen, the present building was commenced and finished; the Earl of Lichfield and Viscount Anson cordially supporting it.

The design is by Messrs. Johnson and Son, of Lichfield; the building is in the Elizabethan style, and consists of an arcade extending the entire length of the principal front, which leads into a spacious covered market. The upper room is the Corn Exchange, approached by a broad flight of stone steps, and is 63 feet in length and 34 feet wide. It is calculated to contain from 600 to 800 persons. One portion of the room is built as an octagon, with a chaste open roof, the timbers of which are stained a rich brown, and the ceiling between the joists a light rose tint—adding much to the general effect. A dado of American deal, highly varnished, runs round the room, the grain of the wood being unusually handsome. The room is lighted with gas, by means of three magnificent glit chandeliers. There is also an elegant and convenient ante-room, thereby adding to the completeness of the building.

The whole of the works were completed by Messrs. Scott and Collyer, builders, of Lichfield; and the workmanship is admirably executed.

The opening of the Corn Exchange was announced to take place yesterday, to be celebrated by a grand dinner in the great room—Richard Green, Esq., the chairman of the company, presiding.

The accompanying Sketch is taken from Tamworth-street, and shows the principal front towards Conduit-street, and the Savings-Bank in Bore-street. The octangular front faces St. Mary-square.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 409.—Vol. xvi.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, 1850. [Sixpence.

THE METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY, AND THE DWELLINGS OF THE POOR.

The Water Companies of the Metropolis have found a defender in Sir William Clay, Bart., Chairman of the Grand Junction and Southwark and Vauxhall Water Companies. Sir William, in a pamphlet entitled "Remarks on the Water Supply of London," has undertaken to prove that the recent outcry raised against the Water Companies is unjust, and that all the companies, whether providing their customers with water from the Thames, the Wandle, the Colne, or the Lea, provide not alone a sufficient, but an abundant and wholesome supply. He has also undertaken to prove that the existing companies are not over-paid for their vast expenditure of capital. These are bold tasks; and it is only justice to Sir William Clay to state that he has brought to bear upon the subject a great amount of practical knowledge; that he has exhibited a thorough acquaintance with it in all its details; that he has treated it impartially, both under its public and its private aspects; and that he has made out a case which will make the judicious pause before they add their voices to the general chorus of indignation which has been raised indiscriminately against all the companies.

We doubt, however, whether, if the householders of the metropolis were polled, to decide by their votes the three questions of the sufficiency and the purity of the supply, and the reasonableness of the rates, the result would be in accordance with the opinion formed by Sir William Clay. In all but the very poorest class of houses it is possible that in the matter of quantity there may be no just reason of complaint. It is also probable that the New River Company supplies a wholesome liquid, unpolluted by sewerage or other impurity; and it is also very likely that shares in Water Companies do not pay exorbitant or even large dividends. The questions which the public are called upon to consider are—Firstly, whether the smaller class of houses are properly supplied—those small houses in filthy courts and alleys where pestilence is bred? Secondly, whether the companies that draw their supplies from the Thames within tidal influence, do not pour into the houses of the people a liquid holding every kind of impurity and abomination either in mechanical or in chemical solution? And thirdly, whether, under a municipal system of water supply, the water rents would not be much lower than they can by any possibility become in the hands of monopolist corporations of private traders? We are glad to see that even Sir William Clay, emphatic as he is in asserting the sufficiency and wholesomeness of the water administered to the metropolis under the present system, has no objection to the overthrow of private monopoly; and that he has supported, and will again support, a reform which shall render the supply of water a municipal enterprize, under public controul. All that he stipulates for is a fair compensation to the existing companies. For vesting the water supply in the public, Sir William cites five reasons which seem to him conclusive:—

1st. A supply of water, abundant and of good quality, is so absolutely essential, not only to the public health, but even to public morals, that it would appear, on this account alone, to fall within that class of functions which a Government is bound to take upon itself.

2ndly. There is a great and obvious convenience in the supply of water being vested in the same authority in any locality as the paving and sewerage.

3rdly. There is, perhaps, no other mode by which the public can be perfectly protected against the possible occurrence of some of those evils to which monopoly has been found to lead, and at all events the cost of water will, or ought to be, less to the consumer. To private parties the supply of water is a commercial enterprize—they have a right to look for rates which will not only pay current interest on the capital expended, but as much larger a return as will be a compensation for the risk incurred. This right is founded in justice, and must always be, as it has always been, recognized by the Legislature.

4thly. There is nothing in the character of a water supply which places it beyond the range of those functions which public authorities may conveniently discharge. There is no commercial acuteness required, no buying and selling, no watching of markets. The works once well formed—the carrying them on may be entrusted, not only without inconvenience, but perhaps with advantage, to one superintending officer, acting under the control of the governing authority.

Lastly. The parties distributing water must of necessity be invested with very stringent powers, partaking of the nature of the powers of a police, which will of course be less invidiously, as well as more efficiently, exercised by the recognised agents of public authority, than by the servants of a company.

Sir William believes that the means exist for making the purchase on behalf of the public of the property of the Water Companies:—

And that it would be easy to complete an arrangement of the kind I have suggested, on terms which, while they should be fair to the companies, would be ultimately very advantageous to the public. On the transfer of the water-works to the public, there would arise immediately a large increase of net income from three sources

1st. From the consolidation of establishments, after allowing retiring pensions to such of the officers of the companies as might not be retained by the new authorities.

2adly. From the greater vigilance and strictness with which the rates would be collected by a public body, than they are now by the companies, and the lower percentage on the collection, when forming part of a general rate collection for municipal purposes.

3rdly. From the new rates to be received from the householders (or owners of houses rather) who now refuse to take a water supply, but, in the case supposed, would be compelled to take a supply and pay for it.

It would be easy to shew that from these sources—taking the metropolis throughout—a large increase of net income might be obtained. A far larger, although prospective increase, would be derived from the growth of London, which would for many years add no inconsiderable increase year by year to the revenue derivable from a water supply. From the income thus at the disposal of the State, it would be easy to provide the means of purchase of the water-works property. This might be done either by raising the sum agreed on as the price of the works, on the scarcity of the rates, as was proposed in the Health of Towns Bill, as first brought in by Government in 1847, or by a rent-charge. By either mode the means would exist of giving to the existing companies the full value of their property, and yet of providing prospectively a surplus income, which at no very remote period would become considerable.

This surplus might either be employed as a sinking fund for the gradual extinction of the rates, or it might be kept in hand as a means of general improvement of the metropolis.

It will be seen from the foregoing extracts, that, although Sir William is a stanch defender of the existing companies against the accusations which have been levelled at them since the period when the prevalence of cholera drew public attention to the subject with more than usual intensity, he is not obstinate in his advocacy of his clients, and by no means disinclined to play the part of a sanatory reformer. His pamphlet is, in fact, nothing more than an elaborate and ably-argued plea for compensation; yet, with the utmost deference to his zeal and judgment, we must assert that the plea was scarcely needed. It was never, as far as we are aware, proposed by any person, in or out of Parliament, or even so much as hinted, that equitable compensation should not be made to all the companies. So that, after all, upon his main argument, the excellent Baronet has bestowed his labour in vain. We are glad, however, to know that as a sanatory reformer his opinions are not influenced by the position he holds as chairman of a monopolist water company; and that when the question comes fairly before the Legislature, as come it must, the cause of public health and cleanliness will have his decided support.

Sir William's good opinion of the Thames water is almost the only point on which the public generally will feel inclined to dispute the accuracy of his judgment—of his olfactory perception. But this, after all, is a point of no importance. Whether the existing water companies be or be not suffered to continue to supply London with water from the Thames, it is quite clear than London itself will not much longer be suffered to pollute that noble river by discharging into it the daily filth of two millions of people. The public voice has unanimously decided that the first sanatory reform needed in this great metropolis is the purification of the tidal stream, which ignorance and mismanagement have converted into one mighty sewer, of which the impurities increase in exact proportion with the increase of population. We may be sure, whatever may be in other respects the solution of the water-question, that the Thames will not be allowed to be a breeder of pestilence and malaria to the City, to which it might be the source of health and comfort, as well as of wealth and prosperity.

There is but one other point in Sir William's pamphlet which we have not noticed, but it is one of great importance, and one, also, that has been lately much under sight of late. It has been stated that there are 70,000 houses in London, having no water supply at all. Sir William thinks this number a gross exaggeration; but, whether it be so or not, it is admitted on all hands that a very large number of such houses exist. It is obviously the interest of the water companies to diminish this number, and to make every house-holder a consumer of water and payer of rates. But, in the miserable houses occupied by the poorest of the people, very often as weekly tenants, it is not easy under the existing system to introduce a supply. The occupants cannot bear the expense of laying on the water, and the landlord will not. The companies have the powers to compel the owners of such property to incur this trifling and most needful expenditure; the consequences are, that the poor are unsupplied, that disease and pestilence are rife amongst them, and that periodically the disease and pestilence extend beyond the filthy nests in which they were originally hatched, to invade the dwellings of the rich and comfortable, and prove but too painfully and surely that no class can neglect with impunity the health and safety of another. The remedy for this state of things, though difficult under the present system, would, as Sir William Clay observes, be easy under municipal management. "It cannot," he says, "be too clearly understood that there is no other mode of remedying this insufferable social evil than by lodging somewhere, in the hands either of the water companies or of some municipal authority, a power to compel the proprietors of houses below a certain class, to take a water supply at rates to be agreed upon." We believe that in Glasgow, and in some other towns, a clause in the local acts enables the water companies to exercise this authority, and that the owners of house property have ceased to consider it an evil. Some such authority is imperatively needed in London; and we cannot doubt that sooner or later the Legislature will take it in hand, along with the water question generally, and that the result will be beneficial and satisfactory, both to the water companies and to the public.

FRIGHTFUL OCCURRENCE IN WOMBWELL'S MENAGERIE.

On Saturday evening last, an inquest was held at the Golden Lion Inn, Chatham, before J. Hind, Esq., coroner for West Kent, touching the death of Thos. Bright, a young girl, aged 17 years, who was killed on the previous evening by a tiger, in the exhibition of the caravan of Mr. Wombwell, which had arrived in that town for exhibition on the preceding day. The deceased, who was denominated "the Lion Queen," had the honour of performing before her Majesty some time ago, at Windsor Castle; and, as will be seen from the evidence, was going through the usual evolutions with a lion and tiger at the time she met with her melancholy death.

Stephen King, the first witness examined, said he had been in the employ of Mr. Wombwell, as keeper, for the last six years. The deceased was a niece of Mr. Wombwell, and daughter of John Bright, a bustle-player in the band. It was the business of the deceased to go into the dens and perform with the beasts, which she had been in the habit of doing several times daily for the last twelve months. On Friday evening, shortly after nine o'clock, she went into the den in which a lion and tiger were kept, for the purpose of performing as usual the tricks played by her being principally with the former animal. She had only been in two or three minutes, but at gone through the main part of the performance, excepting that of making the lion descend in a particular part of the cage, when—the tiger being in her way—the deceased struck it lightly with a small whip, which she carried in her hand. The beast growled, as if in anger, and, approaching close to the side of the den, stretched out its paw, as it at her leg or dress, causing the deceased to fall sideways against the cage; the animal at the same moment sprang at her, and, seizing her forcibly by the neck, inserted the teeth of the upper jaw in her chin, and, in closing his mouth, inflicted frightful injury in the throat with his fangs. He then appeared to change his position, making a second gripe or rose the head of his victim. A keeper, who was standing on the step of the den, armed with a whip, immediately struck at her assailant, but the animal did not loose its hold until struck over the nose violently with an iron bar; and whilst King held the tiger, the poor woman was removed from the cage, bleeding profusely, and life all but extinct. She was taken into one of the caravans, where she was immediately attended by two medical gentlemen, who happened to be present at the time of the occurrence.

By the Jury: The animal had never exhibited symptoms of animosity before. All the animals appeared very fond of deceased, and she of them. Witness had frequently heard Mr. Wombwell say he wished there was no Lion Queen. Witness thought it else had kept the whip from the animal, it would not have attacked her. Deceased had never exhibited any symptoms of fear, and had frequently gone into the den to the animals when there had been no company present, for practice and amusement. It had been said that, perhaps, it happened because the beasts had not been fed, and it was a few minutes past their time. In answer to that, witness could only say, he had frequently seen her go amongst the animals on a Monday, when they had not been fed on the previous day.

Richard Cooper Todd, surgeon, attached to the Royal Artillery, stationed in Brompton Barracks, said he was witnessing the exhibition at the time of the occurrence, and was standing quite close to the rope in front of the den. He saw the deceased enter, and on going in the tiger did not appear to be very friendly with her; she struck him on entering, and he lay down. She then proceeded to her performances with the lion, and, after waving him round, and again struck the tiger. It appeared angry, and immediately seemed to turn upon the deceased, rearing upon his hind legs, and seizing her by the neck. She fell on her back, and the ferocious animal fixed his fangs in her throat, and would not leave from the den, when he hastened to her assistance. She was perfectly insensible, and had lost a great deal of blood, and her face and lips were very pale. She was still alive, but her heart was beating; but she was perfectly insensible. Witness placed his hand on the wound in the neck to stop the bleeding, and administered some brandy to deceased, but she was unable to swallow it, and in a very few minutes her heart ceased to beat. There were four wounds on the left side of the neck, a slight wound on the right leg, and another on the chin, caused by the teeth of the tiger, whose jaw had caused a very large wound under the chin, which, aided by the shock to the system had undoubtedly produced death.

The Jury returned a verdict to the effect that deceased was killed by a male tiger whilst exhibiting in its den, and expressed a strong opinion against the practice of allowing persons to perform in a den with animals.

The occurrence excited very painful interest, and a great number of persons were present during the inquiry.

The alarm and confusion among the spectators at the moment of the frightful scene baffled description. Some of those present pressing on each other in their efforts to escape. Fortunately, however, none were seriously injured.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The old vexed question of National Education conducted on secular principles by the State, through the instrumentality of the Paris University and its officshoots, or managed by the Church, on the principle of combining religious instruction with it—which has so agitated the country during the present Position, has been again raised, with its wonted acerbity, under the Republic, by a fundamental bill at present under discussion in the Legislative Assembly on the subject; and now, as then, neither the adherents of the Secular, nor those of the Ecclesiastical party seem in the slightest degree disposed to forego what they regard as their peculiarly just claims to occupy solely the wide domain of National Education. Indeed, the question is even further complicated than it was under the Monarchy, by the non-existence of a new element of discord, in the person of the Mountain, or Ultra-Republican party, to the claims of both Church and State alike in the matter—the theology of the one not being more repugnant to their ideas of what should constitute the proper moral training of youth, than the absolutist centralization of the other is obnoxious to their notions of the official and administrative freedom which ought to preside over the important task of Public Instruction.

In the course of the debate during the week, M. Barthelmy de St. Hilaire spoke against the proposed law. He defended the right of the university—that is to say, of the State—to exercise supreme control over the whole system of education—masters, machinery, scholars, and all. The new law opened the council-board of the university to certain heads of the Church, and other members of the community not in connexion with the university, and, in fact, reduced the control exercised by this Government institution to a due subordination to the views and feelings of other parties. That settlement was regarded as a surrender of education to the Jesuits.

The Bishop of Langres, who spoke the sentiments of the Church, declared that no views had undergone any change; but as he had been told that it was necessary for the Church to make sacrifices, for peace sake, he would assent to the bill, although he had little hope of its effecting what he would believe to be its purpose.

M. Victor Hugo wished to have an extensive public instruction given and regulated by the State. He was desirous that France should present a vast ensemble—a sort of network of educational workshops. Its starting-point should be the village seminary, and it should rise as far as the Institute. He would not have a commune without a school, not a city without a college, not a town without a faculty. The hearts of the people should be placed in constant communication with the brain of the elevated position of instruction with the surveillance of the State, but by the State exclusively laical. He would not introduce into the councils either Bishops or delegates of Bishops. He wanted a complete Church and State. The present bill would only be an additional weapon given to the clergy. He would not entrust the education of youth to the clerical party, who had long sought to put restrictions on the liberty of the press. And how many days for Italy and Spain? Italy now knew not how to read, though it had been the mother of nations, of poets, of genius, and of the arts. Spain had lost her rank among the nations, but, by the elevated position of inquisitor, some present might wish to see re-established. (Here the hon. member was interrupted by violent gesticulations from the Right, and violent shouts of "Order, order!" "He is reading the Constitution of 1793!" "A la lune!" "A la lune!" It is only romantic nonsense!") M. Victor Hugo concluded by declaring against the bill; and, when he sat down, he was loudly applauded by the Left, while a terrific explosion of murmurs issued from the Right.

M. Potgonlat replied to M. Victor Hugo, and said that the Church needed not his sympathy, for that it had resisted the attacks of much more vigorous champions, and triumphed over more talented and dangerous philosophers than he.

M. Pascal Duprat spoke in favour of the free organisation of education, and maintained that the State could no more claim the right of public instruction than of trade and industry.

This coup d'œil of the discussion shows pretty fairly the present condition of this all-important question, which does not seem likely to be either speedily or satisfactorily settled.

The Archbishop of Paris has just addressed to his clergy a pastoral letter, accompanying three ordinances relating to ecclesiastical matters. The first establishes for five years severe examinations for young priests on the principal points of ecclesiastical knowledge; the second prescribes certain modifications in the diocesan conferences established at Paris by his predecessor; and the third orders for the diocese of Paris conferences for the examination of cases of conscience, as is practised at Rome. They are to be held every two months, under the presidency of the Archbishop, and are to be composed of all the priests of the diocese. The first of these conferences is fixed for Feb. 8.

The official returns have been published by the Government of the indirect taxes and revenues of France, in 1849, amounted to 701,73,000f. In 1847 they produced 820,643,000f., and in 1848. 676,750,000f., showing a diminution, as compared with the latter year, of 143,893,000f., and an augmentation of 24,923,000f. The receipts of 1847, however, included the two-thirds of the proceeds of the tax on salt, suppressed in 1849, amounting to 46,859,000f., so that the real diminution does not exceed 97,000,000f. or 4,000,000f less than the deficit calculated upon in the estimates. The receipts will also be increased by the taxes remaining to be recovered on the 31st of December last, estimated at 20,94,000f.; so that the receipts for 1849 will be 721,407,000f. The receipts of 1848 likewise included the two-thirds of the tax on salt, amounting to 42,923,000f., so that the actual increase in 1849, over the last year, is 67,151,000f.

Republican meetings are being held almost daily in Paris. The reason assigned by the leaders is the approach of a coup d'état. The Government is not unmindful of their movements.

It is generally understood that the Government has renounced the intention of sending any additional force to Monte Video, and it is rumoured that the remonstrances of Lord Normanby have had much to do with this prudent resolve.

Forty-five of the insurgents of June, detained at Cherbourg, have just been pardoned. There are now only fifty insurgent prisoners remaining in the fort of Hommet, at Cherbourg.

Thirty-two of the political prisoners confined in Doullens have been removed to the penitentiary of the Citadel. They were allowed to walk about in the yard of their prison, and endeavoured, by that means, to escape over the walls.

One subject which has caused a good deal of acrimonious writing, and which the papers are much taken up with discussing, is that of the decorations laid down in the Napoleon (the President's especial organ) on certain constitutional topics. This journal defends at some length the openly avowed assumption of the President to retain his Ministers without respect to votes of the Assembly, on the principle that the Ministers are the mere agents of the President of the United States. To this it is replied that the Ministers of the President of the United States are not members of Congress, so that to make the analogy perfect, the French Ministers should not sit in their seats; and regret is expressed that the Pre-ident of the Republic, instead of endeavouring to reconcile and conciliate, should thus seek to irritate and keep open the breach caused by his Message of the 31st October. So stands the controversy at present.

Accounts from the departments continue to speak of the severity of the weather, and of the immense quantity of snow that has fallen, and which has caused several disasters. In Corsica, in one way and a remote, a letter-carrier was found dead in the snow. In many cantons of the department of the Ariège, the snow has risen to the coping of the houses. Many persons have perished in the avalanches, which are frequent, and whole flocks of sheep have been swept away. In the Jura the communication is completely interrupted, and many persons have fallen a prey to the wolves.

At Luchon, in the Pyrenees, more snow has fallen than has been known within the memory of man.

ITALIAN STATES.

PIEDMONT. Accounts from Turin bring the important intelligence that the treaty of peace with Austria, concluded at Milan, was ratified by the Assembly on the evening of the 9th instant, by a majority of 112 to 17.

ROME.—From Rome, under date of the 5th inst., we learn that the French army of occupation is to be reduced to 18,000 men. The cold was intense, and the roads were covered with snow. The Pope, whose return is said to depend on his effecting a loan, is likely, it is thought, to enter the city once more within a short time, as the accompaniment of the loan is regarded as quite certain. The "Eternal City," wishing to perpetuate the remembrance of its gratitude to the French army, has just had a medal struck, representing, on one side, as the personification of the French army in Italy, the features of the ex-General-in-Chief Oudinot, with this inscription:—

Vici. Oudinotus Gallorum Exercitui Præfectus.

And, on the other, in the centre of an oaken crown, the words

Civibus
Expugnatæ civitatis
Civium et Asylum
In colenti.ad
A. M.D.C.C.C.XLIX.

This medal, which is elegantly executed, has been addressed, in the name of the Municipality of Rome, by M. Bartholomeo Belli, President of the Academy of Inscriptions and Monuments, to General Oudinot, with an appropriate letter, declaring that the Roman Senate, having decreed that a medal should be struck, destined to transmit to posterity the testimony of the gratitude of the Eternal City for the humanity and generous sentiments of his Excellency, the dies of the work would, in a few days, be transmitted to him, to be handed down as an heirloom in his family, significative of the obligations which the inhabitants of Rome were under to him for his excellent conduct.

PORTUGAL.

The Cortes were opened at Lisbon by the Queen in person on the 2nd instant, on which occasion her Majesty delivered a speech from the throne, filled, after the manner of such effusions, with empty phrases, "signifying nothing."

BELGIUM.

The Senate of Belgium has ratified the treaty of navigation between Belgium and France. Objections were made, in the course of the debate, by some senators, that the treaty would enable French vessels to deprive those of Belgium of the conveyance of salt, and that the concessions made by France, in return for the abandonment of the toils of the Escaut, were not sufficient; but, after hearing the Minister of Foreign Affairs, these objections were not persisted in.

TURKEY.

Accounts from Constantinople, of the 31st ult., state, that on that day diplomatic relations were renewed between the Sublime Porte and Russia and Austria. The arrangement and conditions of which are implicated in the late insurrection in Hungary are to be expelled, and the Hungarian refugees are to be confined in the town of Kouiah, in Asia Minor. Neither the Porte nor any foreign Power can, for the future, protect any Hungarian refugee who may fly from Russia or Austria into Turkey. No person, however, furnished with an English or a French passport, can be seized on by the Russian or Austrian authorities whilst in the Ottoman Empire, unless the crime with which that person may be charged be fully proved before the Ambassador, Consul, or agent of the Government whose passport he holds.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

ENSIGN DANIEL AUGUSTUS SANDFORD.

THE death of this accomplished gentleman and gallant officer has excited feelings of no common regret. It arose from the excessive fatigues of the campaign in the Punjaub. Mr. Sandford, who had only just completed his twentieth year, was son of the Rev. John Sandford, vicar of Dunchurch, nephew of the late Sir Daniel Keyte Sandford, and grandson of Dr. Sandford, Episcopalian Bishop of Edinburgh. The family from which sprung the Sandfords of Sandford, in Shropshire—is one of the few in England that can trace an unbroken male descent from a Norman follower of the Conqueror.

"It may not be, perhaps, very generally known (we quote from the Edinburgh Courant) that this young gentleman, who, had he been spared, could scarcely have failed to have risen to distinction, and fulfilled the most sanguine expectations his friends entertained of him, was the author of 'Leaves from the Journal of a Subaltern during the Campaign in the Punjaub,' published a month or two ago by the Messrs. Blackwood. These memoranda, the gleanings of an observant eye, and the outpourings of a finely-toned and generous spirit, were jotted down, it appears, without the slightest view of ever being presented to the public eye; but, having been communicated piecemeal to his friends in England, were, without even his personal consent, transmitted to the columns of the Times, from the great interest exhibited at the part it regarding the position of our Indian affairs, more especially after the sanguinary battle of Chillianwallah, of which, as well as the previous battle of Ramnuggur, and the subsequent crowning victory of Goojerat, they contain a graphic and most animated account."

Mr Sandford was in the 52nd Bengal European Regiment, to which he was appointed in 1848.

EDWARD DUBOIS, ESQ.

THIS gentleman, who was well known as a man of wit and classical learning, died on the 16th instant, at his house in Sloane-street. The first appearance of Mr. Dubois as an author was in 1793, when he published a volume entitled "The Wreath," consisting of selections from Sappho, Bion, and Moschus, with a prose translation. In the year 1802 he published "Odd Nick," a satirical work, in three volumes, and next year

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday being the day to which Parliament was prorogued, the House of Lords was opened for the purpose of further proroguing Parliament by Royal Commission till the 31st inst., in conformity with the order issued by her Majesty in Council a few days ago.

There were several sittings, principally consisting of the fair sex, present, who occupied seats in the body of the house.

The reporters' gallery has been brought forward several feet nearer to the bar; and without in any way destroying the general effect of the appearance, but rather improving it, the speakers can be heard much better than before. Scaffolding is still up to enable the artists to go on with the paintings; but they are now so near completion, that in a few days the scaffolding will be taken down.

Lord Campbell, one of the Commissioners, arrived several minutes before two o'clock; and at the bar we observed Sir Benjamin Hall, M.P.

The Lords Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Breadalbane, and Lord Campbell. Upon their Lordships taking their seats in front of the Throne,

The Lord Chancellor directed Mr. Pulman, the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod, to summon the Commons to the bar.

In a few minutes Mr Pulman returned with Mr. H. Ley, the Deputy Assistant Clerk of the House of Commons, attended by several of the officers of the House, as representatives of the Commons of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lefevre, the Deputy Clerk of Parliament, by order of the Lord Chancellor, read the Royal Commission, empowering the Lords Commissioners to prorogue Parliament from this day to the 31st instant; then to meet for the despatch of business.

The Lord Chancellor then said, that by virtue of the Commission just read, and in obedience to her Majesty's commands, the Parliament stood prorogued till Thursday, the 31st instant, and the Parliament stood prorogued accordingly.

EXHIBITION OF THE WORKS OF INDUSTRY OF ALL NATIONS IN 1851.

Public Subscription.—The Executive Committee have received orders from the Commissioners to open a subscription for the promotion of this exhibition, to publish the following communication:—"The Royal Commissioners have felt it their duty, at this their first meeting, to take into their immediate consideration the propriety of confirming the contract which has been entered into with the Messrs. Munday. They are perfectly satisfied that the contract was framed with the sole desire on the part of the Society of Arts of promoting the objects of the commission—that in agreeing to it at a time when the success of the scheme was necessarily still doubtful, the Messrs. Munday evinced a most liberal spirit—that it has hitherto afforded the means of defraying all preliminary expenses, and that its conditions are strictly reasonable, and even favourable to the public. After hearing, however, the statements made by individual members of the commission; after communicating with the Executive Committee; and after full consideration of the whole subject, the commissioners have come to the conclusion that it will be more consonant with the public feeling, and therefore more conducive to the objects for which the commission has been appointed, to exercise the power reserved, and at once and absolutely to terminate the contract with the Messrs. Munday. This determination necessarily throws the whole burden of the exhibition upon voluntary contributions. The experiment is of a national character, and the commissioners feel that it ought to rest for its support upon national sympathies, and upon such liberal contributions as those sympathies may dictate. The amount of the funds which the public may place at the disposal of the commissioners must determine the extent of accommodation which can be provided for the exhibitors, and the terms on which admission can be given to the articles to be exhibited, and upon which also the public may be admitted to inspect them. The commissioners wish it to be understood that they are invested with unrestricted power over the application of the funds; that it is their intention to invite competition in respect of all branches of expenditure to which competition can advantageously be applied; and that they will proceed, without delay, to establish regulations for insuring an effectual control over the expenditure, and a satisfactory audit of the accounts. The commissioners feel that, in thus abandoning a contract which, regarded in a pecuniary point of view alone, is undoubtedly advantageous to the public, and resting the success of the proposed experiment entirely upon public sympathy, they have adopted a course in harmony with the general feelings of the community. They will proceed, with all possible despatch, to determine the form of contributions, the character of the proposed exhibition, and the extent of benefit to industry in all its branches which will result from it. It is desirable that subscriptions for this great purpose be immediately commenced throughout the United Kingdom, and the result ascertained with the least possible delay. In the meantime, the commissioners will be actively engaged in preparing the various measures upon which it will be their duty to report, at the first meeting as soon as they are enabled definitively to ascertain the extent of the pecuniary means which will be placed at their disposal."

The following circular has been sent to the mayors and other principal authorities of all the chief towns throughout the country:—

Offices of the Executive Committee, Old Palace yard,
London, January 14.

Sir,—I am directed by the Executive Committee, acting under the instructions of her Majesty's commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851, to announce to you that the Queen has been pleased to issue a Royal commission for the promotion of the Exhibition of the Works of Industry of all Nations, to be holden in the year 1851, of which I herewith transmit to you a copy; and I have to request your attention to the cause by which her Majesty has empowered the commissioners to appoint persons of ability to be local commissioners, to aid in the execution of the commission. To render the authority of the following resolutions, which the commissioners passed at their first meeting, that the Executive Committee make this communication to you:—

[illegible]

1. That the Executive Committee be directed forthwith to issue a circular to the Mayors of all the towns within the United Kingdom having a municipal constitution, announcing to them the issue of a Royal commission, and inquiring whether a local committee has been appointed within the town; and requesting that, if no local committee has been formed, the Mayor will communicate with the principal inhabitants for the purpose of ascertaining whether, in their opinion, the circumstances of the town render it advisable to appoint a local [illegible]

In the cases where such committees do exist, or in which they may hereafter be appointed, the mayor to be requested to place himself in communication with the local committee in them, and report whether it is wished that local commissioners should be appointed for the town; on what grounds their appointment is desired, what number of commissioners is proposed; and what names are recommended.

2. In the case of municipal towns having Chambers of Commerce, a similar circular to be addressed also to the President of the Chamber, and a request made that he will communicate with the mayor upon the subject.

3. In towns or districts having municipal constitutions, but in which local committees have been or may be formed, the circular to be sent to such local committees.

In giving effect to the resolutions of her Majesty's Commissioners, the Executive Committee have to request that, if a committee exist in your town, you will have the kindness to communicate with the chairman of such committee, for the purpose of reporting whether it is wished that local commissioners should be appointed for your town. If so,

On what ground the appointment is desired,

What number is proposed,

And the names of the persons recommended by the local committee.

If there is no committee already formed in your town, I am to request that you will immediately communicate with the principal inhabitants, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the circumstances of the town render it advisable to appoint a local committee; and that you will, at early date, favour the commissioners with the results of such inquiry, in the carrying out of which the Executive Committee will be prepared to give every information and assistance in their power. When a committee has been formed, I am to request that the steps suggested in the last paragraph, with reference to the appointment of local commissioners, may be taken.

The duties which will devolve upon the local commissioners will consist chiefly in collecting evidence, and in reporting on the various subjects affecting the exhibition which may be referred to them by her Majesty's Commissioners, who will at all times be glad to receive from them such suggestions as they may think fit to lay before them; and, should personal assistance be required, the local commissioners will probably be willing to attend in the metropolis from time to time.

The Executive Committee would point out the obvious inexpediency of nominating too large a number of local commissioners; and they have, therefore, to request that the names suggested by your committee may be as few as compatible with a due representation of the several interests of the locality. Should your committee deem to nominate commissioners jointly with the local committee or committees of any neighbouring place or places, they will of course be at liberty to do so.

The Executive Committee will feel obliged if you will transmit, at your earliest possible convenience, the full names and addresses of the local commissioners recommended by your committee, together with a specification of the particular interest they are chosen to represent,* in order that the same may be submitted to her Majesty's commissioners.

I shall be obliged by being favoured with a complete list of the committee named for your town, should such not already have been sent to me.

I have further to inform you, that if your committee desire to be furnished with the publications in reference to the Exhibition which the Executive Committee may issue, they will cause them to be sent to you upon your application for the same.

I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient humble servant,

MATTHEW DIGBY WYATT,
Secretary of the Executive Committee.

CONDITION OF IRELAND.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE NEW POOR-LAW.

It is not my intention, in these concluding remarks, to advert to the large or small areas of rating, to a maximum rate, to a rate in aid, and whether it should be imperial or confined to the unions; to the number of boards of guardians; to the powers of the commissioners and inspectors, or to any other of the many subordinate questions of administrative detail which have much engaged the attention of legislators, landowners, and public writers. All these are susceptible of almost infinite modifications, and might be altered according to fancy, without touching the principle of the Poor-Law. My remarks will be confined to the principle; and, if that be erroneous, the more complete the system of administration, the more disastrous will be the consequences.

Do not suppose that, in questioning the principle of the law, I advocate the misrule of the landowners, who demand the repeal of this law, and the restoration of the Corn-Law. I have seen enough to be thoroughly convinced, speaking of them as a body, and admitting many exceptions, that they are grossly selfish, ignorant, negligent, profligate, and reckless. To the serf-like people they have always been more oppressors than protectors; and have thought of them only as wrongs out of which they were to squeeze the utmost possible amount of rent, to squander on their own pleasures. No men, fread, like these, from responsibility by their power to make laws, ever acted otherwise. But all the facts I have brought under your notice, and the great fact, attested by numerous authorities, that large districts have been driven out of cultivation and are lying waste, because the demands of the Poor-Law far exceed their value, prove distinctly that the Poor-Law is not the proper way of perpetuating their responsibility. A first wrong is not redressed by committing a second wrong on another party. For the landlords, as a body, I have no respect, and cannot feel any pity. At the same time, it is folly, if not crime, to punish them by transferring their estates to paupers. I bear no hostility to them, like many of the priests and people; though I cannot, like the Legislature, which, being composed chiefly of them, looks at society through their eyes, expect from them, or from any legislative improvement in their tenures, the regeneration of the country. In the interest of the people, and especially with a view to their elevation, only to be brought about by an increase of wealth, and not in the interest of the landlords, I look at the Poor-Law. If it weakens the springs of industry, lessen production and accumulation, and confirms the criminal invasion by the Legislature of the right of private property—the great wrong perpetually done to Ireland, the great source, undoubtedly, of the gross poverty and distress of the Irish, a wrong tantamount to violating the sanctity of life, "for you take my life when you take that whereon I live," though it be now directed in anger against the property of the landlord for the behoof of the pauper—it must be a most mistaken law.

This is not an occasion for discussing the general principle of a Poor-Law, which must always be considered in relation to the circumstances of the soil; and the applicability of the law to Ireland must be determined by the condition of the people. We may condemn the manner in which the land was appropriated—we may trace to that many present evils; but we must take it as it exists; and, though to alter it may be necessary, I shall not at present inquire into the just means of dealing with a wrong first perpetrated long ago and continued to our time.

The soil of Ireland belongs in fee to fewer owners than any equal area in Western Europe, except Spain. It has been demised in many cases to tenants for life, who share the property with the owners in fee; and under each one there is with it what they like. The whole land has long been bound in legal fetters and complicated interests. Besides this, most of the proprietors have long been seriously embarrassed; their estates were mortgaged, and, according to their rank and condition, they required all the rent they could possibly exact. To this end they had not prevented, if they had not encouraged, the division of their properties into great numbers of small holdings. Almost destitute of manufactures and commerce, the bulk of the Irish relied exclusively on the land for their subsistence: they competed for it in the fiercest manner; and, in order to retain it, promised and paid the most exorbitant rent, being content to live on the smallest possible quantity of the coarsest food. In 1847, the number of holdings, according to Captain Larcom's report, after many thousands had been merged in others or left altogether waste, was 691,271. And under no condition can the exact number when the law was enacted; but, in 1841, the holdings of more than one acre and less than five acres exceeded those of 1847 by 184,510. From that fact, I infer that the total number of holdings in the year 1841 had been much less than 1,000,000. At the period, then, of enacting the Poor-Law, the land was owned by a few embarrassed proprietors; and it was divided into an immense number of small holdings, the great majority of which were held by men in the very lowest condition of existence. Of a population of 8,000,000, it was estimated that 2,000,000 were in such a state of destitution as partly to subsist by mendicancy and to require relief. The applicability of the Poor-Law to that condition of society is the question. The condition of the land at one time an opinion prevailed that small holdings were inconsistent with good agriculture, and that a greater net produce and higher rents would be obtained from large than from small farms. From all quarters the landowners of the old lords had continually been advised to diminish the number and enlarge the size of the holdings, to treat the land on the commercial principle, and the process of eviction and agglomeration had in many cases been carried to a great extent. Clearing was before fearful: to prevent vagrancy, and guard against its increase by evictions, the law was partly justified; by taking away the pretext for vagrancy, eviction was encouraged.

I have already shown you, by the immense number of evictions in the last few years, that the law in fact gave a terrific impulse to the process. Clearing estates of the people has latterly been the great object of the landowners, and the chief recommendation of statesmen and public writers to their authority. The landlords may have been misled; they may, in this case, as in many others, have misunderstood their own interest; but there cannot be a doubt that, since the Poor-Law was passed, the condition both of the land and the people on the landowners has been much deteriorated. The latter have been impoverished; the former, when spared, have been famished down to hopeless degradation, and, in many cases, almost exterminated by death. In my business especially to show how the law contributed to this disastrous result.

It is usually described as a law to make property, and particularly the property of the landlords, support poverty; but the great fact of mass pauperism, the heart of a legislator, who can by no means divest himself of our natural selfishness—is wonderfully deceitful; and the law, which is nominally said to be for the support of the poor, at the expense of property, is in reality framed, practically under the name of property, for the support of the poor, at the expense of industry. Its principle is to make those who have anything share it with those who have nothing. It is avowedly intended to make property support poverty. Following the law of Elizabeth, or rather the amended Poor Law of 1834—which in 1838 had not developed all its sinister effects, and was supposed, at least by its authors, to be an admirable law the Legislature adopted a workhouse test, and levied rates on the occupiers as well as on the landowners; it taxed industry as well as land; it levied rates on profit as well as rent, for the support of the destitution that already existed, and that might be created by the clearing process; it enacted that half of the rate should be paid by the occupiers, and thus made the Irish asylum for the evicted which was wholly inadequate, and which the poor wretches, from custom and feeling, were slow to enter—it satisfied the consciences of the evicting landlords; and, by throwing the burden on the occupiers, it really made the unevicted, industrious tenantry pay a large part of the expense of clearing the landlords' estates. That arrested the progress of industry in Ireland. The law fell on improving the condition of the people. The small occupiers struggling out of the mire of general poverty, and thrust them back to be smothered.

It is perfectly clear that the very smallest occupiers could pay no rates, and the landowners having been made responsible for the rates, eviction was further encouraged by a desire to get rid of non-ratepaying tenants, and to acquire tenants who, occupying larger holdings, would pay rates. The law, therefore, tended to the destruction of the people, as really as ever it did when it was avowedly intended to exterminate them. Only a few years ago the rates were before the famine of 1846. All the numerous occupiers of small holdings who found it difficult to live before they were subjected to a poor-rate, then found it impossible. In many cases their property was sold for the rates, and a serious blow given to the national industry. The dearth of 1846, partly the consequence of that, found all sanery paralyzed; and when the hand of the State, full of wealth, was sent out to relieve the famishing, it only added to the increase of the terrible demands of the collectors, they one and all nearly gave up the unprofitable pursuit of farming, and threw themselves on the State for help. We hear in our time a great deal of judgments; but if ever there were a judgment, the utter prostration of the Irish, consequent on the failure of a harvest greater than usual, was a judgment for the law which deprived the industrious occupiers of their property, stopped their exertions, and almost rooted up out of their hearts

Our want of space compels us to postpone the remainder of the communication till next week; but we must subjoin our Correspondent's brief Postscript.

P.S.—I must correct a mistake committed in my last communication. There are two Chiffens in Ireland, and the one in Galway was the property of the D'Arcy family, and not of the Chiffen family, as I stated. I am also informed that the Messrs. Eastwood are not English, but Irish-English.

The amount of the precious metals exported from London during the week ending the 5th inst.—was Silver coin, 50,000 ozs.; Silver bullion to Dunkirk, 80 000 oz.; to Belgium, 130,000 oz. Silver bar to Belgium, 23,000 ozs.; making a total export of 238,000 ozs. of silver

Last week, an unfortunate policeman was found during the night lying on the pavement in Harrison-street, Gray's-inn-road, surrounded by a pool of blood. He was conveyed to the Royal Free Hospital, where it was discovered that his skull was fractured. He died in the course of the following afternoon. It is supposed that he had been to try the door of one of the houses, and that, in returning, his foot slipped, and his head coming in contact with one of the steps, he thus met with the injury.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.

In a convocation holden on Saturday last, it was unanimously agreed to affix the University seal to a respectful address of condolence to her Majesty the Queen, on occasion of the decease of her late Majesty the Queen Dowager.

Lent Term began on Monday last, when a Congregation was holden for granting degrees and conferring degrees.

The Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History (the Rev. R. Hussey) proposes to begin his lectures for this term on Monday, February 4. The junior class will read "Ezechi Historia Ecclesiastica," continued from last term; the senior class, "Bedæ Historia Gentis Anglorum." The lectures are open to all members of the University who have passed the B A. examination. Those who wish to attend are requested to call on the Professor between twelve and two o'clock on Saturday, February 2.

University College, London.—The council have appointed Dr. A. Barine Garrod to the office of professor of materia medica and physician to the hospital, lately held by Dr Anthony Todd Thomson

Preferments.—The following preferments and appointments have taken place: The Rev. J. Quarry, Prebendary of Ross, to be a Canon in the Cathedral. The Rev. Jarvis Kendrick, to the Perpetual Vicarage of St. Peter the Great, otherwise Sub-Deanery, Chichester. The Rev. W. Baynes, to the Rectory of Chalvington, Sussex. The Rev. H. S. Disbrowe, to the Rectory of Conisholme, Lincolnshire. The Rev. W. H. Hutchinson, to the Rectory of Laceby, Lincolnshire. The Rev. J. James, to the Rectory of Peakirk, Northamptonshire. The Rev. W. A. Paxton, to the Rectory of Otterden, Kent. The Rev. James Farrer Reeve, to the consolidated Rectories of Great and Little Thornham, in Suffolk. The Rev. W. J. Poole, to the Rectory of Aberfraw, Anglesey. The Rev. Stair Douglas, to the Rectory of Ifakbourne, Sussex. The Rev. Julius Ashwright, to the Vicarage of Latton, Essex. The Rev. S. Ridley, to the Vicarage of St. Clement's, Cambridge. The Rev. R. Barker, to the Vicarage of Pagham, Sussex. The Rev. A. D. Parkinson, to the Vicarage of Ulterby, Lincolnshire. The Rev. T. Sikes, to the Vicarage of Luton, Bedfordshire. The Rev. H. T. Young, to the Vicarage of Munden, Essex. The Rev. J. Clancy, to the Vicarage of Claverdon, with Norton Lindsey Curacy, Worcestershire. The Rev. Frederic Reade, to the Perpetual Curacy of St. Mark's Church, Kemptown, Brighton, diocese of Chichester; patrons, the Trustees of St. Mary's Hall, Brighton. The Rev. A. D. Wagner, to the Curacy of the new church of St. Paul, Brighton, diocese of Chichester; patron, the Rev. H. M. Wagner. Vicar of Brighton. The Rev. C. D. Goldie, to the Perpetual Curacy of High Tyrnton, county and diocese of Lincoln; £80; patron, the Bishop of Carlisle. The Rev. J. P. Hastings to be Chaplain to the Bishop of Llandaff. Rev. High George Robinson to Holy Trinity Church P.C. Preston, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Thomas Raven; patrons on this occasion, T. B Addison, Esq, and otherswtrymen of the church. Rev. Richard Compton Maul to Rickinghall Inferior R., Suffolk, diocese of Norwich; £453, with residence on the presentation of John Compton Maul, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn. Rev. Edward Crow to Creaton R., Northamptonshire, diocese of Peterborough; £210, without residence.

Vacancies.—Little Clacton V., Essex, dio. Rochester, £115, with residence; patron, Sir Thomas Neville, Bart. Rev. J. L. Kirby, deceased. Hambledon R., Surrey, diocese Winchester; £207, with residence; void by death of Rev. E. Bullock; pat., Earl Radnor. Wendover V., Bucks, diocese Oxford; value £211; patron, Rev. S. Thornton, deceased; pat., Lord Chancellor.

Emigrant Chaplaincy.—The Rev. Douglas Cooper has been appointed, by the Bishop of Sydney, Chaplain of the immigrants newly arrived at that colony. From the Bishop's instructions we learn that the local superiors of the emigrant chaplain for Sydney will in every case be made available for the benefit of the emigrants, at the earliest possible period. In the event of any vessel arriving, on board of which is a clergyman of the Church of England, in charge of emigrants, his duties will continue until the landing of the passengers, who will thenceforth be placed under the care of the Colonial Chaplain for Emigrants. In other cases it is ordered that "The duty of the Chaplain for Emigrants will be, on the arrival of a vessel in harbour, having emigrants on board, to visit the same as speedily as the Government regulations will permit; and to enter into communication with such of the passengers as may be declaredly members of the Church of England, or may voluntarily desire to avail themselves of his ministerial services."

On the feast of the Circumcision, the Rev. William Margetson Heald, M.A., vicar of Bristall, Yorkshire, laid the foundation of a new church, dedicated to the Holy Virgin Mary, at Gomersal, in the above parish; on which occasion William Hirst, Esq., of Marsh House, presented to the vicar, with an address, a silver trowel of elaborate workmanship, bearing an appropriate inscription.

IRELAND.

Representation of Limerick.—Mr. John O'Connell has published a letter addressed to any admirer, on the impoverished state of the country, to raise a fund, as suggested, to purchase an annuity for him. The hon. gentleman's election committee at Limerick have, after much consideration, come to the decision not to accept his resignation at the present, on the ground of the defective state of the registry as regards Repeal interests, and calculate on a larger augmentation of the forces at the next April sessions.

The Protection Movement in Ireland.—Generally speaking, the meetings have been failures, the people evincing no sympathy with the movement. The Evening Post publishes the following letter from Mr. Cobden, in reply to one from Dr. Sheil, of Ballysannon:—"London, Jan. 5, 1850. Dear Sir,—I have sent you a newspaper, containing a letter of Mr. Bright's speech at Manchester, upon the subject of Ireland, in whose views generally I heartily concur. My own remarks at Leeds would explain the opinion I entertain of the present movement of the Irish landlords, which appears to me a barefaced display of shallow cunning and base hypocrisy, as is this cry of the landowners for a bread-tax, under the plea of bettering the condition of a starving people. I very much doubt if their representatives in the House will be willing to bring forward, for discussion, such a question. I should wish nothing better than to have the opportunity of meeting them on that ground, and I remain, dear sir, truly yours, Richard Cobden."

A great Free Trade meeting was held at Castletown-rock, in the county of Cork, on Sunday last, to counteract the Protection movement in that quarter. The chair was taken by Dr. Power, M.P.; and among those assembled on the occasion were a great many Roman Catholic clergymen. The following resolutions were adopted:

That the present high poor-rates have not risen from Free Trade; but from other causes, viz., want of employment, which arose from failure of the potato crop and the cruelty of extermunating landlords, who would make no abatement in their rents, or, at least, one reasonable to the full extent of the Gregory clause.

That the foundation of agricultural prosperity is security of tenure by tenant right or long leases, which will enable the tenant to dispose of his farm to the highest bidder, and be regulated by the reduction in the value of corn, &c.

That the present cry for Protection is got up for selfish purposes, firstly, to divert the minds of the people from the just demand for exact right and reasonable rents; and, secondly, to enable the Conservatives to get into the representation of the country, to which they have not any claim, and to check the march of enlightened legislation, and hence we denounce the Protectionist meetings as a mockery, a delusion, and a snare.

That a committee be appointed to prepare a petition to Parliament showing the monster evil of the Irish Church establishment, and praying that the surplus revenues be appropriated to the national purposes.

That the warmest thanks of this meeting are due and hereby offered to John Bright, Esq., M.P., for his sympathy for the Irish people, in expressing it in the same manner their condition and circumstances to our English fellow-subjects

Falling off of the Irish Constituencies.—The subjoined statement appears in the Banner of Ulster. We have been making inquiries in various directions relative to the effect which the current pressure of the times has had upon the £10 constituencies of Down and Antrim, and we find, as we had suspected, that an immense proportion of this class of voters, in both counties, has been politically annihilated. In some districts with which we happen to be particularly acquainted, we learn that two-fifths of the £10 freeholders who were on the roll last year have now ceased to be £10 freeholders have been practically disfranchised by the rack-renting system, and could not now conscientiously take the qualification oath, were an election to happen to occur:

A novel attempt was made by Mr. Napier, in the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, on Monday, to compel a board of guardians, by a mandamus, to levy a rate for the purpose of paying a debt due to a contractor. The judges, however, refused the application, and referred Mr. Napier's client to the Poor-Law Commissioners for the only remedy which could be obtained in the case.

Excessive Rents.—The assistant barrister for Clare informed the grand jury of that county last week, according to the Limerick Examiner, that he was aware of a bill being in preparation by Government that would prevent landlords recovering by law process rent "not in keeping with the Poor-law valuation."

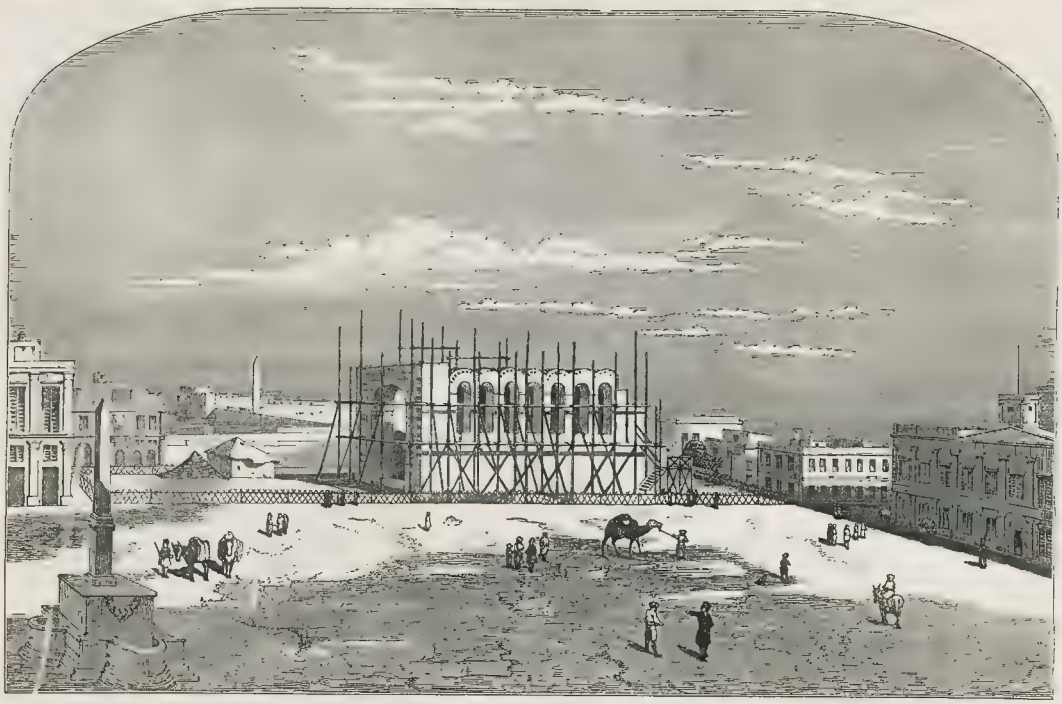
Repeal Association.—The rent for the week ending Monday last amounted to £12 4s. 6d. Mr. John O'Connell announced that he had no intention of resigning his seat, until the electors of Limerick were prepared with a staunch Repealer to occupy his place.

Ejectments in Tipperary.—The heartless system is not relaxed, even at the present inclement season. "You will be sorry," says a correspondent of the Limerick Examiner, "to learn that seventy houses have been unroofed and the inmates evicted, at a place called Drumcleve, near the town of Tipperary. A number of houses were also knocked down and the occupiers sent out at Bansha. At Doon several houses have been pulled down."

Agrarian Assassination.—After a longer interval than usual, we hear of one of those horrible cases of agrarian murder which afford such a fearful comment on the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland. The crime of this occasion, as on many similar, was perpetrated in the same county which was the scene of the above-mentioned eviction, viz. Tipperary, and the victim was a land-agent, William Ardell, steward to Mr. Falkner, who was shot through the heart on Friday night week, and his body found the next morning where he fell, between his employer's residence and his own house, which was about a quarter of a mile asunder.

At the Thurles Quarter Sessions, last week, there were upwards of fifty cases of ejectment.

Sale at a Workhouse.—On Saturday last, the Sub-Sheriff of Galway sold off the property, consisting of clothing, furniture, &c. of the Thurles Workhouse, under an execution for £500, at the suit of some Dublin and Galway merchants.



THE GREAT SQUARE IN ALEXANDRIA.—PRESENT STATE OF THE PROPOSED CHURCH FOR THE ENGLISH PROTESTANT RESIDENTS.

CHURCH FOR THE ENGLISH RESIDENTS IN ALEXANDRIA.

ELEVEN years have elapsed since the British residents at Alexandria set on foot a project for erecting a Church, which should adequately serve for the purposes of Christian worship for the increasing English population, both of residents and sojourners, who were, from various causes, attached to the commercial capital of Egypt. Mohammed Ali, the late Pasha of Egypt, munificently made a present of a valuable plot of land, situated in the great square of Alexandria, as a site for the proposed edifice. Encouraged by this noble act, the British residents set themselves to secure the services of a resident chaplain, and to raise funds for the erection of a Church. The former advantage they have now for several years enjoyed; the latter, as our readers will perceive, continues unattained. The actual residents in Alexandria are, we are informed, a small body, not exceeding seventy in number. This fact, coupled with the very laudable resolution which they formed, not to content themselves, and so dishonour the religion of their country in the midst of a large Mahometan city, with the erection of a "cheap church," which should "cost them nothing," is, we believe, among the chief reasons why the completion of the edifice has been so long delayed. The building, we regret to find, has now been suspended nearly three years, in consequence of the exhaustion of all the funds (about £4000) which had been contributed. The walls have been carried up 40 feet; but, as there is no roof on, the work already completed is suffering positive injury from the effects of the weather, even in the dry climate of Egypt. The scaffolded building, standing undisturbed by "sound of axe or hammer," tells a dreary tale to the English traveller, and one but little creditable to our country in the eyes of Christians of every persuasion, as also of the Mahometans, who throng the streets of Alexandria. Indeed, it is with pain that we hear that a recent document set forth by the residents talks of the "abandonment of the design" as a not impossible event, if the remaining sum, estimated at from £2000 to £3000, needful for the completion of the building, be not forthcoming. This, we venture to say, will not be the case. The residents have done much; but much might yet be raised, if the two thousand passengers who are said annually to pass through Alexandria to and from India, were each asked to contribute their mite. We are convinced, moreover, that the merchants and great commercial bodies in London would acknowledge that the Church of their country has a claim upon them in this matter, when they consider that some 200 British vessels annually enter the port of Alexandria, for whose crews the new Church would be available. We are glad to learn that a second effort is about to be made in this country, to carry through this good design.

We trust that the Christian zeal of Englishmen will be stirred up for the honour of their Church in this the second commercial city of the Turkish empire; and that the city of St. Mark and of the great Athanasius will have, at least, one Christian Church in it amid the dilapidated and crumbling temples of the Eastern Christians—not unworthy, for beauty and purity of design, to stand amidst the Mosques of the False Prophet, as an evidence of the faith of Englishmen, and of their allegiance to the Cross.

CHURCH OF SAINT PAUL, AT MALTA.

IN the Memoir of the lamented Queen Dowager, in our Journal of Dec. 8, 1849 we briefly recorded her Majesty's munificent act of defraying the entire charge of building a large Church at Malta, for the accommodation of the English residents in the island. Hitherto, the accommodation afforded them was the Government chapel, a room fitted up in the palace of the Governor at Valetta, and formerly a kitchen, besides which was the Dockyard chapel. These were long the only means provided by the Government for Divine worship, and strangers were generally unable to attend at all. The Queen Dowager, on her visit to the island, in 1838, witnessed this spiritual destitution, and provided for it by the building of the handsome Church here engraved.

The first stone was laid by Queen Adelaide on the 20th of March, 1839, and the foundation was completed by the close of the year. No labour was spared by the superintendent architect to insure the durability of the edifice; and, though often with immense difficulty, every part of the foundation was based upon solid rock, which, in many instances, was found covered with 30 feet of rubbish.

The main features of the exterior are a lofty portico facing N.E., and supported by six Ionic columns; and a tower and spire, 130 feet high, surmounted by a cross.

The interior is very spacious: its dimensions are stated to exceed those of any of the modern churches in London, the length of the area being 110 feet; breadth, 67 feet; and height, 45 feet. Marylebone, one of the largest parish churches in the metropolis, measures 105 by 70 feet.

The Malta Church has open sittings for upwards of 1500 persons. The ceiling is elegantly decorated with panels and mouldings, and is supported by ranges of columns, with richly sculptured Corinthian columns; and the sides and altar end are embellished with pilasters of similar design.

The Church has been built at a cost of £18,000, exceeding by one-third the amount of the Queen Dowager's original grant. Malta has since become the official residence of the Bishop of Gibraltar, whose palace faces the portico of St. Paul's Church.

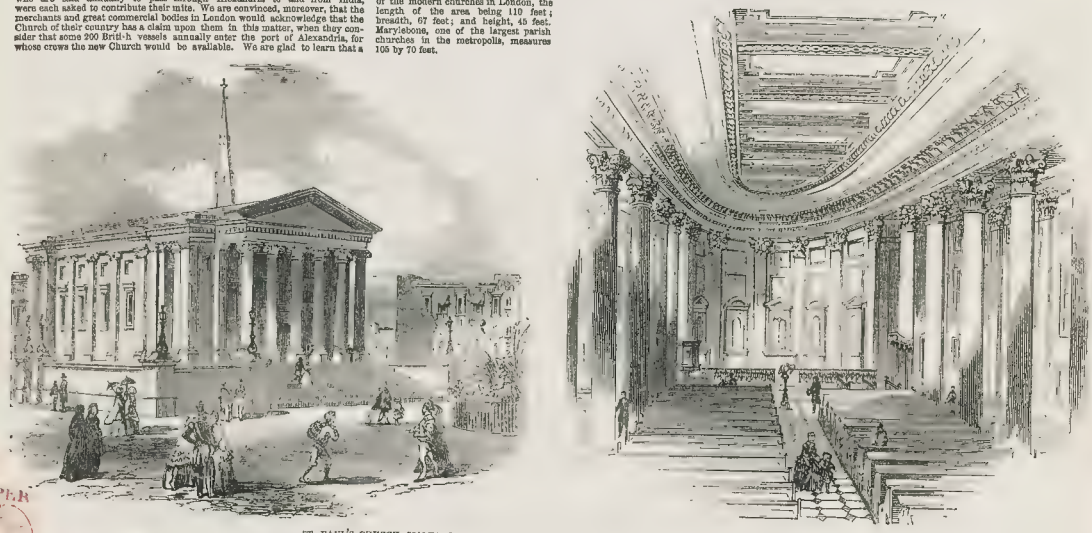
This stately memorial of the piety of Queen Adelaide must be visited or viewed by every Protestant with heartfelt gratitude, whilst it relieves the Maltese capital of some of its monotony:—

> Whereon the sultry wind for ever swells
> The thunder of ten thousand tuneless bells,
> While priestly drones in hourly pageant pass,
> Hived in their several cells by sound of brass;
> Where England's merriest month looks sorry,
> And the waste island seems but one wide quarry.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION.—THE LATE CHAPLAIN OF AYLESBURY GAOL.—At the Epiphany Sessions at Aylesbury, just held, a motion was brought forward to grant an annuity to the Rev. Mr. Cox, the late chaplain of the County Gaol, who was compelled to retire in consequence of his refusing to divulge to the magistrates the nature of the confessions of John Tawell, the Quaker (murderer of Eliza Hart, at Salt Hill). None of the magistrates present at a very full bench, except the mover and seconder, Mr. Barker and Dr. Lee, held up their hands in favour of the motion, which was consequently lost. Mr. Cox is said to be in very distressed circumstances.

The churchwardens of St John's Church, Newton, have recently received a beautiful coloured cloth for the communion table of the new church in that district, the gift of Mrs. Peake, of Harewood.

It is in contemplation to originate a subscription for the purpose of placing a large stained glass window in some part of Worcester Cathedral, in commemoration of the virtues and as a tribute of respect to the memory of the late Queen Dowager.



ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, MALTA, BUILT AT THE EXPENSE OF THE LATE QUEEN DOWAGER ADELAIDE.

THE NOTTS TESTIMONIAL TO LORD GEORGE BENTINCK.

THE memorial of the county of Nottingham to the lamented Lord George Bentinck has, after considerable delay, been agreed upon, and is now in course of erection. As the county has produced several able architects, the committee have acted wisely in employing one of those gentlemen—Mr. T. C. Hine, of Nottingham, an artist of considerable local reputation, and whose name is not altogether unknown out of the district. He has produced for the Bentinck Memorial a design of great merit; and, when completed, it will add to the attractions of the handsome little town of Mansfield.

Nottingham is remarkable for its market-places. That in its county-town is known all over England as the most spacious in the country; and the other principal towns of the shire partake of this characteristic. The market at Mansfield, for the size of the place, is large; and it is already embellished with a town-hall, of classic design.

A better site could not be selected for the monument to Lord George Bentinck, independently of the fact that it is immediately adjacent to the birth-place of the distinguished statesman, and is the centre of a large agricultural district. It is about four miles from Newstead Abbey, renowned as the ancestral seat of another master-spirit—Lord Byron. The extensive domains of the Duke of Portland, the Duke of Newcastle, and the Earl Manvers—forming what are popularly termed "the Dukeries"—are also in the immediate neighbourhood.

Various propositions were submitted for the memorial: the addition of a new wing to the General Hospital at Nottingham, the foundation of an Agricultural College, and the building of a number of Almshouses, were among the designs suggested. A monument in Southwell Minster was also named; but all these were declined for Mr. Hine's design, which resembles an ancient market cross.

This is a richly ornamented Gothic structure, about 30 feet high, of the style that prevailed in the fourteenth century. It will occupy a space, including the steps, of twenty-four feet square. The whole is divided into three stages—the base or pedestal; a gabled canopy, supported on pinnacled buttresses and clustered columns; and a lofty spire pierced with traceried and gabled lights, and terminated with a gilded vane. The lower stage consists of a flight of steps, surmounted by an arcaded pedestal, with shields of the armorial bearings of the Portland family, and a deeply-recessed set-off, to receive the buttresses and columns of the canopy. At its four angles are pedestals surmounted by lions sejants, supporting vanes, upon which also will be emblazoned the family arms. The gables of the canopy are filled with diaper-work, and sculptures emblematic of the interests which Lord George Bentinck so ably advocated. The pinnacles, gables, and spire-lights are throughout enriched with carved crockets, so as to add considerably to the architectural embellishment of the design.

The contract for the building has been undertaken by Mr. Charles Lindley, of Mansfield; and the execution of the work, so far as it has proceeded, is very creditable to him.

We understand that Mr. Hine introduced in the original design a statue beneath the canopy; but we are not aware that such an addition is contemplated by the committee; though it would add greatly to the interest of the monument.

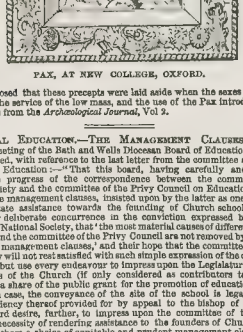
CURIOSITIES.—XI.

PAX, NEW COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THIS very interesting specimen of the skill of the early workers in silver, is preserved in New College, Oxford, along with some most valuable relics of the founder of the college, William of Wykeham. The Pax is five inches and a half high by three inches and one-tenth broad; and was, most probably, wrought about the time of Henry VI., or rather later.

According to Dr. Milner, the use of the Pax was, perhaps, introduced into the Roman Catholic Church in the service of low mass, apparently in the twelfth or thirteenth century; the Pax being first kissed by the priest, then by the clerk, and afterwards by the people assisting at the service, in lieu of the embrace which had been customary in following, literally, the injunction of St. Paul to the Corinthians—"Greet ye one another with an holy kiss." This custom of kissing is mentioned by Tertullian and others, and was performed thus, as quoted by Dr. Milner—"Let the Bishop salute the church, and say, The peace of God be with you all: and let the people say—And with thy spirit. Then let the Deacon say to all—Salute one another with an holy kiss: and let the Clergy kiss the Bishop, and the laymen the laymen, and the women the women."



PAX, AT NEW COLLEGE, OXFORD.

It is supposed that these precepts were laid aside when the sexes were mixed together in the service of the low mass, and the use of the Pax introduced. Our Engraving is from the Archæological Journal, Vol 2.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.—THE MANAGEMENT CLAUSES.—At the quarterly meeting of the Bath and Wells Diocesan Board of Education, just held, it was resolved, with reference to the last letter from the committee of the Privy Council on Education:—"That this board, having carefully and anxiously watched the progress of the correspondence between the committee of the Privy Council and the committee of the Privy Council on Education, upon the subject of the management clauses, insisted upon by the latter as one of the conditions of State assistance towards the founding of Church schools, desire to express their deliberate concurrence in the conviction expressed by the committee of the National Society, that 'the most material causes of difference between the Church and the committee of the Privy Council are not removed by the modification of the management clauses,' and their hope that the committee of the National Society will not rest satisfied with such simple expression of the conviction of their minds, but use every endeavour to impress upon the Legislature the justice of the claims of the Church (if only considered as contributors to the public revenue) to a share of the public grant for the promotion of education, provided that, in each case, the conveyance of the site of the school is legally secured, and the efficiency thereof provided for by appeal to the bishop of the diocese. And this board decides, further, to impress upon the committee of the National Society the necessity of rendering assistance to the founders of Church schools, by affording them a choice of equitable and prudent management clauses, which give encouragement to lay co-operation, without infringement of that undivided privilege and responsibility which, according to the divine constitution of the Church, attaches to the clergyman of the parish and the bishop of the diocese; and of confining the application of the funds placed at their disposal by the Church to such schools as shall adopt one of such clauses so devised and approved; or wishing for entire freedom, such as the National Society has always advocated, shall, on those grounds, refuse to admit any management clauses whatsoever."

MR. WAKLEY ON "INSANITY."—Mr. Wakley has contributed his mite of confusion to this much confused subject. A drunken fellow died suddenly in Islington, and his wife complained at the inquest that she had tried unsuccessfully to get him into the lunatic ward at the workhouse—the surgeon would not certify his insanity. Mr. Wakley seeing that gentleman in court, asked him why he did not give a certificate of the unsoundness of the man's mind.—Mr. Pearce replied that he never noticed a deficiency of intellect, although he saw him almost daily during his illness.—Mr. Wakley: His wife has sworn that he was a drunkard, and I hold that all such characters are mad, and ought to be placed in confinement. No one possessed of a rational mind will get intoxicated.—Mr. Pearce: If I were called on to certify in such cases, there would be a clearance of half the neighbourhood.—Mr. Wakley: The evil is great, and sorely to be lamented. However, I have no hesitation in saying that such unfortunate individuals ought to be confined and treated as lunatics.—Mr. Pearce: You must bear in mind, sir, that if I were to certify unjustly in a case of insanity, I should make myself liable to a penalty of £100, which I am sure would be enforced were I to do as you wish.—Mr. Wakley: I contend that you would be justified.

SILVER INKSTAND,

PRESENTED TO THE INCUMBENT OF ST. MARY-LE-TOWER, IPSWICH.

IT may be in the recollection of our readers, that some time since, the old colours of the 12th, or East Suffolk Regiment of Foot, were placed in the church of St. Mary-le-Tower, at Ipswich, by permission of the Incumbent; but were shortly afterwards removed by order of his Diocesan. The Incumbent protested against this proceeding; and the Regiment have recognised the Rev. gentleman's conduct upon the occasion, by presenting him, on Monday week, with a handsome Silver Inkstand, of appropriate design, and bearing the following inscription:—

"Presented by General the Honourable R. Meade, Lieut.-Colonel Patton, the Officers, Non-commissioned Officers, and Men, 1st Battalion, 12th or East Suffolk Regiment, to the Reverend William Nassau St. Leger, A.B., Incumbent of St. Mary-le-Tower, Ipswich, in grateful appreciation of his chivalrous and reverent reception of their old Colours into the Chancel of his Church, and noble protest against the violation of their consecrated repose.

"Weedon, December 15th, 1849."

The Inkstand consists of a base, which rests upon four scroll-formed feet of alternately bright and frosted silver; and in the centre supporting a model of the rock and Castle of Gibraltar, between two silver vases. At each end, and reposing against the vases, are the Colours of the Regiment most elaborately executed in frosted silver. On the Colours are "Minden," "Gibraltar," "Seringapatam," "India." Around the summit of the rock, is a scroll with the inscription, "Montis Insignia Calpe." The Castle is executed in frosted silver, and on each of its doors is raised in high and bright relief the Key, being part of the badge of the distinguished 12th Regiment. The covers of the vases are ornamented with the crest, and on the reverse side of the base are the family arms, of the Reverend gentleman; whilst around the salver runs a wreath composed of oak-leaves and acorns.

This elegant work is from the establishment of Mr. Benjamin Smith, of Duke-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields.

The Inkstand, on its presentation, was accompanied by a letter from Lieut.-Colonel Patton, of the 12th, in which he records the clergyman's generous sense of the spirit which prompted the placing of the old colours in the mother church of the chief town in that division of the county wherein the regiment was raised. "It is difficult," says the writer, "to comprehend how a proposal so complimentary to the town of Ipswich, so reverent, and in such fine accord with the genius of our military institutions, could fail in receiving respectful acquiescence, if it did not awaken the enthusiastic sympathy of the authority who decided upon its rejection." The letter concludes with an intimation on the part of the officers of the battalion, of their desire that the rev. gentleman be considered in perpetuum an honorary member of their mess; assuring him of the warmest welcome.

To the above, the Rev. Mr. St. Leger has transmitted an eloquent reply, from which we quote these passages:—

"It is not, perhaps, worth an argument, but I would briefly remark that there is no one reason against receiving Colours into a church which will not tell more powerfully against bestowing upon them, in the first instance, a consecrated character. And if Colours be inadmissible, much more should all accoutrements and weapons of war be rejected; and, if these be forbidden, à fortiori should all soldiers themselves, who are sworn and ever ready to use these weapons, be excluded from the sacred edifice, and from the benefit of Divine Service—that is, in other and plainer terms, all soldiers should be excommunicate from the Church of God!

"Soldiers! the old Colours of your regiment, which left your loyal ranks with that same unsullied honour which had ever rested upon them from the hour of their consecration, were received in this place with the highest pomp of military ceremonial. Recording 'India' amongst your scenes of service, your Colours were escorted to the 'mother church of your native county' by heroes of Sobraon and Aliwal; to the holy altar of that church they were borne by officers of high distinction, whose chivalrous enthusiasm coveted the honour of carrying the sacred banners to the peaceful sanctuary; the Queen's Colour was borne by an officer whose decorations told of many a hard-fought field in India; the Regimental Colour was borne by one of illustrious birth—the great-son of Sir Walter Scott—the descendant of the high priest of human nature, and the great master of the human heart—of him who has bequeathed to us this spirit-stirring character of the British soldier—

> For the rights of fair England his broadsword he draws,
> Her King is his leader—her Church is his cause;
> His watchword is honour! his pay is renown!
> God strike with the gallant that strikes for the Crown."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, 1850.

We are glad to see that an influential deputation has waited upon the Prime Minister upon the subject of the Tea Duties; and to believe that, although Lord John Russell, with statesmanlike discretion, has declined to make any promises, or to enter into any explanation upon the views or intentions of Government, there is a prospect that the matter will be fully considered by the Legislature at no distant period. The Government can but look upon the question, in the meantime, under its fiscal aspect; and, until it be convinced, either that the revenue would not be a loser by a reduction of the duty, or that the country is in so prosperous a state as to be able to afford a loss for an object of so much importance, it is quite right in leaving to those interested the task of proving the case, and of taking the initiative in proposing an alteration.

But the question is not purely a fiscal one. It is a moral and commercial question also; and even more important to the great bulk of the community on these accounts, than it can be to the Government, considered merely as the great money-taker, of the people. Both of these points were strongly impressed upon Lord John Russell by members of the highly-influential deputation that waited upon him on Wednesday last, especially by Mr. Brodrick, of Liverpool, and Mr. Law, of Edinburgh. Unfortunately, however, the Government is too much interested in the large amount of revenue derived from the Excise duty on malt and spirits to look with a very favourable eye upon the moral change that would be wrought in the habits of the people by abundant supplies of cheap and good tea. In fact, under our actual fiscal system, the Government has a direct interest in the intemperance of the multitude. It might be proved, however, that the gain in this respect is a loss in others; and that what we profit by the excisemen, we lose by the pauper and the criminal.

The commercial view of the case is equally important, and was placed in a clear and striking light before the Minister by Mr. Cardwell, M.P., who introduced the deputation. Ninety per cent. of the foreign trade of the great, populous, and wealthy empire of China is with this country—notwithstanding the fact that, in return for our manufactures, China has given us her silver, which she cannot spare, and her silk, which we do not greatly want. She desires nothing better than to give us tea in any imaginable quantity that we can consume; but we impede the trade, to her detriment and ours, by a tax, which, upon some descriptions of the article, amounts to no less than from 400 to 600 per cent. upon the value. Our great competitors for the trade with China are the United States of America; and it is easy to foresee that, unless we change our commercial policy in that quarter, we shall be beaten in the struggle, and lose the advantages of one of the best and most expansible markets of the world.

Even as a matter of Revenue—and supposing that it could not be considered upon this form, the tax is open to the serious objection of unfairness—of leaning lightly upon the rich man's luxury, and pressing heavily upon one of the poor man's necessaries of life. Were the duty an ad valorem one, this objection would not apply, but at present, while the rich consumer is taxed under forty or fifty per cent. upon the finer qualities, the washerwoman, the sempstress, and all the labouring poor are charged from two hundred to six hundred per cent. upon the qualities that are alone within the reach of their scanty means. The average of the duty upon all kinds of tea is two hundred and fifty per cent. Look at this tax as we will, it will be found to be indefensible. It was stated last year, under the authority of the Government, that the reduction of the duty to such a moderate rate as would increase consumption and extend trade without seriously damaging the revenue, was merely a question of time, and that the minds of men in power were all but made up on its principle. It is, therefore, more than probable, that, in the reconsideration of our whole fiscal system, which cannot be much longer delayed, either by this Ministry or any other, the existing tea duties will be abolished.

THE Emperor of Russia requires a loan, for the purpose, as is alleged, of completing the railway between St. Petersburg and Moscow. Mr. Cobden and the friends of peace choose to doubt the allegation, and to assert that, in reality, the money is wanted to pay the expenses of the late war against Hungary. They have, therefore, taken the field upon peace principles, to denounce the loan, and dissuade British capitalists from investing their money in it. We think this, to say the least of it, an unfortunate and injudicious movement, and one more calculated to harm than to favour the extension of the great principle of peace among the nations. In the first place, there is no sufficient reason for believing that the Emperor of Russia has come into the money market under false pretences; and, in the second, the morality of loans is a matter for the private consciences of the money-lender, and not for the dictation of men who are not money-lenders, nor in any way concerned with the trade or business of money-lending. An ardent tee-totaller, possessed of a surplus capital, might be indignant if he were asked to lend a friend a few thousands to set up a gin-shop; but he would have no right to preach a crusade against other people who might consider the investment a good one. Mr. Cobden and the Peace Society, if they were asked to invest their earnings in a war-loan, might with good feeling object to such an outlay of their capital; but, not being asked, they have no right to interfere, and still less right to denounce other men who hold opinions that differ from their own. We remember, a short time ago, that a zealous member of the Society of Friends refused to accept of a considerable sum in aid of the funds of a charitable institution of which he was either the chairman or the originator, because the money was the produce of a theatrical entertainment. Such a man might very reasonably object, if called upon to take shares in Drury-Lane or Covent-Garden Theatres; but he would scarcely, even in the opinion of the friends of peace, be justified if he called a public meeting to denounce and hold up to public indignation, as abettors of iniquity, the capitalists who might not have his scruples. The great and holy question of Peace is not to be treated in this manner; and, as friends of that question, we trust we shall hear no more of such impolitic and uncharitable modes of dealing with it.

We are enabled to announce that a meeting of the Protectionist Members of Parliament will assemble at Lord Stanley's residence, in St. James's-square, at twelve o'clock on the 31st inst.—the day on which Parliament is summoned to meet—when the propriety of moving an amendment to the Address will be taken into consideration.—Morning Herald.

A large proportion of the few vessels which have, in consequence of the inclement weather and adverse winds, been enabled to reach the port of London from foreign ports, have been laden with grain and flour, the produce of France. The arrivals of this kind have included several from Dunkirk, as well as from the principal shipping ports of France, and are of some interest and importance.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

Her Majesty the Queen, and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the youthful Royal family, continue, we rejoice to learn, in the enjoyment of excellent health.

The continued frost during the past week has had the effect of varying the amusements of Royalty in some degree, the Prince Consort having several times proceeded to Frogmore, for the purpose of enjoying the diversion of skating on the ornamental lake attached to that Royal residence. Her Majesty the Queen and the Ladies of the Royal household have on both occasions accompanied the Prince; and the Royal sledges have been called into requisition, to the no small gratification of the party.

The Marchioness of Normanby, wife of his Excellency the British Ambassador at the French Court, has been almost the only addition to the Royal circle during the week. Her ladyship arrived at the Castle on Monday, and remained the guest of the Queen and the Prince until Wednesday.

On Friday week, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Col. the Hon. C. Phipps, Col. the Right Hon. C. Grey, and Col. F. H. Seymour, came to town, from Windsor Castle, and presided at the first meeting of the Royal Commissioners for promoting the Exhibition of Industry to take place in the year 1851. His Royal Highness returned to Windsor the same afternoon.

On Sunday morning, the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. G. Wellesley officiated.

On Monday, the Prince Consort enjoyed the sport of shooting, accompanied by Viscount Mandeville and Mr. Henry Seymour. Col. the Hon. C. B. Phipps and Col. F. H. Seymour were in attendance upon his Royal Highness. The Queen drove to Frogmore the same morning, and paid a visit to her august parent, the Duchess of Kent.

On Tuesday, as on Saturday, the Court passed the morning at Frogmore.

On Wednesday the Prince Consort went out shooting, accompanied by Colonel Challoner and Colonel Hall. Colonel the Honourable C. B. Phipps, Colonel the Honourable R. Boyle, Lord Charles Fitzroy, and Colonel F. H. Seymour were in attendance upon his Royal Highness.

On Thursday the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert again drove to Frogmore, attended by the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal household. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Helena accompanied their august parents. The Prince Consort, with the gentlemen in attendance, enjoyed the diversion of skating on the lake. Mr. Hamilton, and Rev. Henry and Lady A. M. Cust had the honour of joining the Royal dinner circle on Thursday.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent has dined with her Majesty and the Prince almost daily during the week.

The Royal children have taken their accustomed walking exercise in the vicinity of the Castle.

The Countess of Charlemont has relieved the Marchioness of Douro in her duties as Lady-in-Waiting to the Queen.

His Royal Highness Prince George and Captain the Hon. James Macdonald have arrived in town from visiting the Earl of Cardigan, at Deane Park.

Her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess (Dowager) of Baden, accompanied by the Marquis and Marchioness of Douglas, arrived at the noble Marquis's villa, on Putney Heath, on Thursday, from Holyrood Palace.

The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk are entertaining a succession of visitors at Arundel Castle.

The Duke of Rutland is surrounded by a large family circle, at Belvoir Castle

The Duke and Duchess of Richmond are entertaining a large party at Goodwood Park.

The Duke and Marchioness of Ailesbury are on the eve of leaving Tottenham Park for Brighton.

The Marquis of Breadalbane has left Park-lane for Brighton, where the Marchioness is at present staying.

The Marquis of Lansdowne arrived in town on Wednesday, from his seat, Bowood Park.

The Marchioness of Douro arrived in Belgrave-street on Wednesday, from Windsor Castle. The noble Marquis and Marchioness left town on Friday, with the Duke of Wellington, at Strathfieldsaye.

The Earl and Countess Granville arrived in Bruton-street on Wednesday, from Paris.

Lord Ward, after a tour in Germany, proceeds to Athens, and will probably make an extended journey into the interior of Greece. The noble Lord is expected to return to this country before the end of April.

Lord Glenelg has recently left town for the Continent.

The Count and Countess Rossi (Mdme. Sontag) have been lately visiting the Duke and Duchess of Cleveland, at Raby Castle.

The Earl and Countess of Jersey have been receiving a succession of visitors during the past week at Middleton-park.

Lord John Russell gave a Cabinet dinner on Wednesday evening, at his residence in Chesham-place. The following guests present were—the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Sir George Grey, Viscount Palmerston, Earl Grey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Francis Baring, Lord Campbell, the Earl of Auckland, and the Right Hon. Mr. Labouchere. On Thursday the noble Lord gave a grand dinner to a number of the Foreign Ambassadors and Ministers, at his residence in Chesham-place. The noble Lord has issued invitations for a grand soirée and concert at the Admiralty in the House of Commons, and a numerous party of members of the lower house, to a full dress dinner, on Wednesday, the 30th inst. This dinner will be given at his Lordship's official residence in Downing-street.

The Lady Caroline Duncombe was safely delivered of a daughter, on Tuesday last, at Wareley Park.

Lord Brougham has arrived in Paris, from his château near Cannes. The noble and learned Lord is expected to arrive in Grafton-street to day, for the season. Lady Brougham is staying in town.

LOUIS PHILIPPE.—A very general rumour prevailed on Thursday evening to the effect that the ex King of the French had expired, after a very brief illness, on the morning of that day, at Claremont. In contradiction of the report, we are enabled to state that Dr. G. De Nussy, who is the chief medical attendant of the ex-King, arrived at his residence in Conduit-street, London, at noon on Thursday (where he had passed the previous night), having left Louis Philippe in perfect health; and that up to nine o'clock on Thursday night no intelligence of the ex-King's illness had reached Doctor Nussy. We may therefore fairly assume that the rumour is unfounded.

ADMISSION OF SOLICITORS IN EASTER TERM, 1850.—The list published by the Incorporated Law Society has just appeared, and gives the following particulars in reference to the number of persons applying to be admitted as attorneys in Easter Term, 1850, 179; being a decrease of 6 on comparison with that of the former list. Notices of admission for Easter Term, to be delivered to the secretary to the Law Society, on or before Feb. 5. Notices of admission for the present term, to be likewise added to the list, in conformity with the Judges' Orders, 4. Applications to the Court for the renewal of certificates on the last day of Hilary Term, 1850, 10. Notices of applications to a judge at chambers for an order for leave to move for a renew of certificates on Feb. 1, 30; thus making the total number of gentlemen either seeking for permission to practice, or for re-admission, as set down in the present list, 221.

CLERK'S LIST—EASTER TERM, 1850.—Notice is hereby given, with the sanction of the benchers of this society, that there will be a voluntary examination for honours on the laws of real property in the hall of this society in Trinity Term next, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 23rd and 24th days of May next, commencing at 10 o'clock A.M. on each day. All students of the bar, members of any inn of court, will be qualified to attend and stand on the occasion. The names of the successful candidates alone will appear in the published classlist, so that those who do not go in for honours, or who do not succeed, will not suffer any prejudice. The gentleman who attains the first place in the list (being of merit not inadequate, in the opinion of the examiners, to entitle him to that distinction) will receive the lecturer's prize, consisting of a set of the "Reports" of Vesey, jun. (20 vols.)

EXAMINATION OF ARTICLED CLERKS.—The examiners appointed for the examination of persons applying to be admitted attorneys have appointed Tuesday, the 22nd January, at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane. The examination will commence at ten o'clock precisely. The articles of clerkship and assignment (if any), with answers to the questions as to service, according to the regulations of the Society, will be required to be left with the secretary on or before Thursday, the 17th inst. Where the articles have not expired, but will expire during the term, the candidate may be examined conditionally; but the articles must be left within the first seven days of term, and answers up to that time.

PUFFING FOR A PREMIUM.—Kohl, in his "Russia," mentions the following curious anecdote:—The Emperor wished to illuminate the Alexander Column in a grand style; the size of the round lamps was found out, and the glasses bespoken at the manufactory, where the workmen exerted themselves in vain, and almost blew the breath out of their bodies in their endeavour to obtain the desired magnitude. The contractor was in despair, when at last self-evident—but how? A great premium was offered to whoever should solve this problem. Again the human bellows toiled and puffed—their object seemed unattainable, when, at last, a long-bearded Russian stepped forward and declared that he could do it; he had strong and sound lungs; he would only rinse his mouth first with a little cold water to refresh them. He applied his mouth to the pipe, and puffed to such purpose, that the vitreous ball swelled and swelled nearly to the required dimensions—up to it—beyond it. "Hold, hold!" cried the lookers-on, "you are doing too much. and how did you do it at all?" "The matter is simple enough," answered the long-beard; "but, first, where is my premium?" And when he had clutched the promised bounty, he explained. He had retained some of the water in his mouth, which had passed through the glowing ball, and there becoming steam, had rendered him this good service.

THE RUSSIAN LOAN.

PUBLIC MEETING AT THE LONDON TAVERN

A public meeting of persons opposed to the Russian Loan, proposed to be raised in this country, was held at one o'clock yesterday (Friday), at the London Tavern: Charles Gilpin, Esq., in the chair. Long before the hour of commencing the proceedings, the large room in which the meeting was held was crowded, and many persons were obliged to go away, from want of accommodation.

Amongst those who were favoured with seats on the platform we observed Mr. Cobden, Rev. John Burnet, Mr. John Morland, Rev. Josh. Turnbull, Mr. Miall, Mr. John Castle, Rev. Henry Richards, Mr. John Mitchell, Mr. Nash. Griffin, Mr. Edward Perry, Mr. Edward Miles, Mr. Edmund Fry, Mr. Chamberlayne, Mr. John Jones, Mr. Thomas Bore, Mr. Frederick Nollew, Mr. Joseph Cooper, Mr. Thomas Bell, and Mr. C. E. Smith.

The Chairman opened the proceedings by stating that the meeting had been called together by the Peace Society, to express the disapprobation of the citizens of London against the proposed loan to the Emperor of all the Russias. The object of the meeting was to protest against the raising of money in this country under false pretences. For there could be no doubt that if the loan were given, it would be used for the purposes of aggression and conquest. The Emperor of Russia had trampled liberty under foot in Hungary and Poland, and would, if supplied with English money, proceed to trample liberty under foot in other countries.

Mr. Cobden proposed, in a speech of an hour's duration, the first resolution as follows:—

That the Government of Russia having proposed to raise in this country a loan of five millions and a half sterling, professedly for the purpose of constructing a railroad from St. Petersburgh to Moscow, but really to pay such the Imperial exchequer, exhausted by the expenses of the war in Hungary this meeting is of opinion that to lend money to the Emperor of Russia had transferred liberty under foot in Hungary and Poland, and would, if supplied with English money, proceed to trample liberty under foot in other countries.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to, as also the following:—

That in the opinion of this meeting loans for war purposes and for the maintenance of standing armaments are unsound in principle, and injurious to the interests of nations.

IRELAND.—THE GREAT PROTECTIONIST MEETING.

The great demonstration in favour of agricultural protection, for which preparations have been making for several weeks past, took place in Dublin on Thursday, in the large room of the Rotundo.

Among the persons present were Lords Ashbrook, Gormanstown, Arundel, Bandon, Bernard, Clements, Castlemaine, Claremont, Downshire, Drogheda, Dunsany, Fitzgerald and Vesey, Naas, M.P., Roden, Shannon, Suirdale, Waterford, Wesmeath, and a large number of the gentry of the surrounding districts, and a few farmers. The room, however, was not quite full. The Marquis of Downshire presided.

Lord Glengall then rose to move the first resolution. His Lordship proceeded to say that he had met that day to present to her Majesty the humble and submissive address under which Ireland has been suffering from the vicious policy assumed in England for some time past. When he looked upon that great meeting representing as it did so large an amount of property, intelligence, and patriotism, he could not think that the battle of Protection was yet lost (Cheers.) He was there to tell the people of Ireland that the struggle was but commencing. (Cheers.) Their friends in England were resolved to struggle with them, and their efforts for justice to all. It might be true the friends of Ireland had failed in the first instance; but he desired the assembly to consider the circumstances under which that failure had occurred. At the battle of Lepsic the Saxon army unarmed, and quite ready to change sides, to fight for whom they pleased, were ostensibly entered fought against the Emperor Napoleon, to fight for whom they were ostensibly entered in the field, and lost the day in consequence. In like manner the Protectionists of this empire were defeated by the desertion of some of their forces. Not only a portion of their army, but its general-in-chief, went over to the enemy. (Cheers for Sir R Peel). Many of those men who had deserted their colours would have to meet their constituents, and he felt confident they would be treated as they deserved The meeting was aware that an address to her Majesty had been extensively signed (Cheers.) That address, up to the present day, had received the signatures of 56 Peers, 26 Baronets, 20 members of Parliament, 117 Deputy-Lieutenants, and 706 magistrates, a vast number of Roman Catholic gentlemen, as well as Protestant clergymen, merchants, professional men, and tenant-farmers (Cheers). Every post brought up additional signatures, and he doubted not that, when that document was complete, it would be found to be signed by millions. (Lord Isolard then rose, and was greeted with loud, long, and hearty cheers.) Lord Glengall concluded his address by moving

That we feel entirely persuaded of the regard and affection entertained by our most gracious Sovereign for all classes of her subjects, and that we are confident that her Majesty will not withhold her sanction from any measure, however distasteful, which her Majesty may consider necessary for the protection of any portion of her subjects, we consider that, under the deplorable circumstances in which Ireland is placed, we best discharge our duty to our Sovereign, as well as to our country, in recommending to her Majesty, for such relief and protection, the unprecedented misery and distress to which this once prosperous island has been reduced

Mr. Macartney, of Lissanone Castle, seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

The Marquis of Westmeath moved the second resolution:—

That the interests of all classes in the country are rapidly deteriorating; that within the last four years the population has been fearfully diminished from famine and pestilence; that the main object for which deputies of each session were re-called, while the best and most industrious classes are emigrating from the country, and those who remain are unable, by any amount of exertion, to bear up against the crisis by which they are surrounded, is unsatisfactory; and it is the deliberate opinion of this meeting that, unless measures be speedily devised to stay the downward progress of events, Ireland will, at no distant day, be reduced to pauperism and ruin.

Isaac Butt, Esq., Q.C., seconded the resolution, which was supported by Mr. Henry Grattan, M.P. It was adopted with acclamation.

The following resolutions were also passed:—

That it is the duty of her Majesty's responsible advisers to submit to Parliament such immediate measures as may relieve this country from the impending ruin; and we deem it right that our dutiful petition for the adoption of such measures be immediately laid before our gracious Sovereign, and that the chairman and requisitionists of this meeting and the honorary secretaries, be requested to take such steps as may be necessary for that purpose, and that they do form themselves into a committee with power to add to their number, to take such measures that may be necessary to carry this and all other resolutions of this meeting into effect.

That Irish interests have been on all occasions sacrificed to false notions of Imperial policy that, by the course of legislation, our manufactures have been crushed; our commerce destroyed, our rising shipping interest ruined; that, by the adoption of the principles of Free Trade, the agricultural interest of Ireland has been reduced to unexampled distress, and the trading community of the towns and villages have shared the sufferings of those on whom they were dependent, and that we are bound to declare our conviction that this fatal policy has received a full and just protection afforded to all branches of native industry, and particularly agriculture, it is impossible for this country to be prosperous and contented.

That while the landowners and landholders of Ireland are burdened with the payment of heavy imposts, and with the repayment of large sums of money expended upon useless works, a poor law wholly confined to the maintenance of the destitute poor, and a system of harsh and oppressive rates have been levied, and that while the industrious are overwhelmed in the effort to maintain an unexampled pauperism, the idle and profligate are left at large, and in many instances, from the undue pressure upon its resources, the unprofitable and waste and that we are satisfied that such steps as may be necessary for the improvement of Ireland this law be substantially amended.

That the great resources of Ireland, her agricultural capabilities, her mines her fisheries, her manufacturing advantages, her commercial position, and her hardy and unemployed complete locality of interest between the owner and the occupier of land; and that we are further persuaded that the cupidity of the one will generally assist the just remuneration and industrious tenant. And that to meet the calamities of the present crisis, the Government will really elevate the condition of the tenant-farmer and the labouring population, we believe the best interests of the country will be secured by measures which, while they do not invade the rights of property, will give the fullest encouragement to the improving cuicle, with the liveried page, to the milkman, with his sledge, and the children at sledge-play. The horses or dogs, as the case may be, are hung with bells; and the street seems to be traversed by an army of muffin-sellers.

A sledge-drive by moonlight is a pleasant affair. The ground is covered with snow, upon which neither horse nor sledge makes any noise; and you hear nothing but the bells that are always affixed to the harness, which sound as if a fairy peal was borne by on the wind. The stilly effect is very singular.

SPORTS ON THE ICE.

We recommend frozen-out lovers of hunting, coursing, and horse-racing, during this frost, to take a trip to Peterborough, and they will find good sport on the ice, particularly on Whittlesea Mere and Whittlesea Wash, where well-contested skating races take place every day. We give a Sketch of an exciting contest on Tuesday last, between two crack skaters; one named Register (alias Flying Dutchman), and the other named Barnes; the stakes being £10 a side. At the signal for starting, both competitors went off at a good pace against a strong head-wind; and during the whole distance the issue was doubtful. The race was won by Register, amidst the cheers of his friends. The distance (two miles) was run in 7 min. 7 sec.; the pace, however, would have been considerably increased, but for the high wind blowing at the time.

We noticed among the visitors at Whittlesea Mere, (which, by the way will be drained before next winter), the Earl Fitzwilliam and the Ladies Fitzwilliam who have liberally contributed towards these sports

CAPTIVE JEWS BY THE WATERS OF BABYLON.—PAINTED BY HENDEMAN.

By the waters of Babylon, sitting forlorn,
We wept bitter tears in that day of our scorn,
As we thought of our Zion, so far, far away,
Of the heathen the scoff, of the spoiler the prey.

They ask'd for a song of our dear native land:
May the skill and the cunning forsake thee, my hand
If ever to please them, blasphemers abhorr'd,
Thou wakest to music the Harp of the Lord.

On the willows of Babel our harps we have hung—
They rock to the breezes, neglected, unstrung;
And if they re-echo, 'tis only in sighs
To the touch of the tempest that howls o'er the skies.

We sit in the shadow, heart-wounded and sore,
And gaze on the waters that foam on the shore;
And envy each billow that flows to the sea,
Because it may wander oh Zion to thee.

We envy the clouds floating calmly above,
And long to take flight on the wings of the dove,
Once more to behold, ere we rest in the sod,
The land of our fathers—the city of God.

Our captors exulting may mock at our woe,
But our tears are our own, and for Zion they flow.
O Zion! we love thee with love unsurpass'd,
And the day we forget thee, that day be our last!—C. M

TORQUAY.

THIS favourite watering-place has been called "the Montpellier of England," from its mild and genial climate, which especially fit it for a winter residence. The place owes but little to antiquity for its present fame. Torwood Manor-house, the ancient seat of the Earls of Londonderry, is now pulled down; and the Chapel of Isham, Tor Abbey, and Chapel-hill, are the only remnants of a past age, and, says Bexley's carefully-written "Route-book of Devon," "the living generation has seen the site where now stand stately buildings, handsome shops, and a noble pier, with a busy population of 5000 souls, occupied by a few miserable-looking fishing-huts, and some loose stones, jutting out from the shore, as a sort of anchorage or protection for the wretched craft of its inhabitants."

The first houses in Torquay were erected for the accommodation of families of officers and invalids belonging to the Channel Fleet, which used, during the last French war, to make it a place of anchorage for some days in every September. One who well knew the spot at this time describes it as "a small row of houses with green blinds, principally inhabited by naval officers' wives." Thence began its repute for the restoration of invalids: its progress has been remarkably rapid; the increase of buildings having been, perhaps, greater than in any other town in the kingdom. "This, in a great measure, may be attributed, in addition to its beauty of situation and salubrity of climate, to the natural advantages it possesses for building. The whole of the stone being found on the spot, the marble quarry, the renter or possessor of a few feet square has only to dig for his basement story, and the material, with the exception of a little timber, which is landed before his door, for the completion of his superstructure is found."

Torquay lies in a small bay, at the north-eastern corner of the larger one, Torbay, on the Devonshire coast of the English Channel.

"Three hills—Park Hill, Waldon Hill, and the Braddons—rise and surround this small bay, something like the audience-part of a theatre; the sea or pier-head being the stage: with this difference only, that the ridges on which the houses are built one row above another, instead of, like the seats in a theatre, preserving a perpendicular front, recede or fall back so as to have a sufficient space before each tier for a wide carriage-drive and footpath. The middle of the circle formed by these hills faces the south-west; between them run two valleys, dividing the east range from the north and south, but such is the winding manner in which they make their entrance to the site, that on looking towards the town from the sea, there appears no break in the chain, but the space which they encircle seems perfectly land-locked. To and from the sea the ground is deeply cut, and crests of the hills are richly clad in verdure, and planted, and in some places thickly wooded."

The town, beginning with the lower tier, is built round three sides of the strand or quay, formed by the pier, and is composed chiefly of shops, having a row of trees in front. The next tier, approached by a winding road at each end, comprises handsome terraces; and the highest, beautiful villas, built with white plantations. The view from either of these levels is enchanting; taking in the whole of the fine expansive roadstead of Torbay, memorable as the place in which William Prince of Orange, afterwards King William, landed in the Revolution of 1688. To this marine prospect is added that of the picturesque country adjacent, commencing by Berry-head to the south, until the eye rests on nearly the opposite extremity—formed by Brixham, Goodrington, and Paignton, and the sands rounding from it to the fine woods of Tor Abbeys, and the town and pier immediately below. The sides and summits of the valleys opening from this circle are also dotted with cottages, pavilions, and villas.

The town is well supplied with water, and lit with gas; has its theatre, news and billiard-rooms; natural history and book societies; two churches, besides chapels; and well-appointed inns and hotels, and bathing establishments. Its steam-packet communication is good; and railway brings it within one hour of Exeter, and five hours of London.

The position, and local protection from cold winds, are the great recommendations of Torquay as a winter watering-place. Dr James Clark says:—

"The general character of the climate of this coast is soft and humid. Torquay is certainly drier than the other places, and almost entirely free from fogs. This drier state of the atmosphere probably arises in part from the limestone rocks, which are confined to the neighbourhood of this place, and from the peculiar position between the two streams, the Dart and the Teign, by which the rain is in some degree attracted. Torquay is also remarkably protected from the north-east winds, the great evil of Spring climates. It is likewise well sheltered from the north-west. This protection from winds extends also over a very considerable tract of beautiful country, abounding in every variety of landscape, so that there is scarcely a wind to blow from which the invalid will not be able to find a shelter for exercise, either on foot or horseback. In this respect Torquay is much superior to any other place we have noticed. It possesses all the advantages of the south-western parts of Devonshire mentioned above, and, with the exception of its exposure to the south-west gales, partakes less of the disadvantages of it than any other place having accommodation for invalids. Indeed, as I have always shewn, and as the experience of the gales on climate will further prove, there exists as much difference between the temperature of this and the position in the south of Scotland and the south of England as between the latter and the south of Europe. The selection will, I believe, lie among the following places, as winter and spring residences:—Torquay, Dartmouth, Hastings, and Clifton, and perhaps in the generality of cases will deserve the preference in the order stated."

"The general mildness of this place may be somewhat appreciated by the statement of the lowest degree of cold experienced in the generally severe winter of 1837–38 being only 21°, while in Exeter it was 17°, Bristol, 8°, Kensington 0, and at Sandhurst 6° below zero. Its summer temperature during the last five years has never exceeded 80° at the highest extreme."

DEPUTATION TO LORD JOHN RUSSELL ON THE TEA DUTIES

On Wednesday, at one o'clock, Sir Thomas Baring Birch and Mr Cardwell, member for Liverpool, accompanied by the following gentlemen—Messrs. William Rathbone, Christopher Rawson, and Edward Brodribb, on behalf of the mercantile interest of Liverpool; Mr Lee, as President of the Chamber of Commerce, Manchester; Mr Kinnear, on behalf of the Chamber of Commerce and manufacturers of Glasgow had an interview with Lord John Russell and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the noble Lord's official residence in Downing-street, on the subject of the reduction of the duty on tea.

Sir Thomas Birch presented the memorial lately agreed to at Liverpool, setting forth in outline the more prominent arguments in favour of the diminution of an impost obnoxious to the moral sense and commercial requirements of the community.

Mr. Cardwell, M.P., then recapitulated the substance of the previous interview, two years since, sanctioned by meeting the objections urged against his statement of the case in the House of Commons. The hon. member proceeded to say that the trade with China, which in 1827 amounted only to £610,000 exports, now reached a larger amount than £2,000,000. Our imports were £3,000,000; £2,400,000. Small as this amount appeared for the consumption of British manufactures by 300,000,000 of people, it unfortunately exceeded the amount which the reciprocal relations of the two countries justified. Figures would be read by Mr. Brodribb, which would show the falling-off that had taken place since 1845. He then referred to the opinions of the British Consul, and of Sir John Davis, quoted in the report of the select committee of 1847, and to the recent letter from the Chinese Imperial Commissioner at Canton, to the effect that our trade with China was the quantity of tea we were able to take in repayment. He then referred to the year 1784, when a reduction in the duty from 6o per cent. to 12½ per cent. produced an immediate increase of 100 per cent. in the first year, and in twelve years nearly fourfold. He adverted to the increased consumption of tea in recent years, notwithstanding the high duty, as refuting the answer made by Mr. Alderman Sidney and other members of the deputation when we had nearly approached the limits of demand. Tea seemed to be peculiarly the consumption of the English race. In the Australian colonies, where there was no duty, the consumption was 9 pounds per head; in Canada, where there was only 1½ lb. per head per annum. He then dwelt upon the calculations as regarded the revenue, and, after saying that other gentlemen would go into the moral and social considerations which the question raised, Mr. Cardwell concluded by saying that the more favourable position of the revenue in the present year had indicated the deputation again to bring their case before the consideration of Government.

Mr. Edward Brodribb., while admitting that the tea-dealers, as a body, were not in favour of a reduction of the duty sought by the deputation, fearing that it would inevitably increase competition and reduce their profits, said that this was an argument involving a conviction that the public would derive more benefit than the mere amount of the duty reduced, as well as that the consumption would quickly increase. This argument also would be hoped, tend to remove from his Lordship's mind the impression, if any such existed, that the deputation were actuated entirely by selfish motives. The commercial part of the question might be briefly dealt with. It appeared by a despatch from Mr. Consul Alcock that the balance of trade against China was 10,000,000 sterling, and unless this balance could be reduced, the present amount of purely British trade, that is, of our manufactured goods imported into China, could not be maintained. The last article which would strike off would of course be the cotton drug, and before the balance of trade could adjust itself, the exclusively British trade of the trade would in all probability be annihilated. Without, therefore, going into the question of how the present amount of British trade is interfered with in its relation to China, or whether, if it is capable of a permanent footing, every shilling's worth of our manufacture will not be altogether excluded from that country, it was very clear that unless the present balance against China could be reduced, our present amount of British trade could not be sustained. The question of the trade is reduced by the increase of our exports from China, which could only be effected by a reduction of the duty as now sought. The exports of tea from China within the last two years had increased £5,000,000, and the amount of the trade taken for home consumption, and by nearly £14,000,000 of the home consumption and foreign exports. The estimates for the ensuing year were that they should be short of about £5,000,000 or £7,000,000 sterling. Mr. Brodribb then entered on the social and moral grounds, which, in the opinion of the deputation, were the strongest upon which a reduction could be urged.

Lord John Russell, having attentively listened to the representations of [illegible] various members of the deputation, said that the gentlemen must be perfectly well aware that, at the present moment, Government could not be expected to [illegible] over on a question involving so many points of importance [illegible] them that the subject should receive the best consideration of himself and his right hon. colleague, the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The members of the deputation thanked his Lordship for the courtesy with which he had received them, and retired.

THE THEATRES.

ST. JAMES'S.

HÉrold's beautiful opera of "Zampa," a masterpiece of the French school, was produced on Wednesday night, after four successful representations of Halévy's "Val d'Andorre." "Zampa," although it contains some comic characters and situations, belongs more properly to the class of grand opera; and requiring very full orchestral accompaniments, various exacting space for the mechanical and scenic effects, was, perhaps, not the most judiciously selected work for the St. James's Theatre. There ought to be three trombones, four horns, and two oboes, to execute the scoring in full; and as there are only one trombone, two horns, and one oboe, and the stringed instruments are not particularly strong in Hanssen's orchestra, many fine points were lost. Chollet, as the Count de Monza, Zampa, the tenor, was of course a host: he was the original representative of the part in Mélesville's drama, when produced in 1831; and although time has impaired his organ, the tact, intelligence, finesse, and spirit of the admirable actor are in full force, and it was surprising to find how he vanquished the difficulties of Zampa's grand scena, and with what energy he gave the drinking song. His scene with the statue of his wife in Alice was replete with recklessness and daring; his love-making to Camilla, whose hand he has secured after she is affianced to his brother Alphonse, by holding her father, Lugano, as a hostage on board his vessel, was graceful and gallant. Mdlle. Charton acquitted herself creditably as Camilla, her lover, Alphonse, was very efficient. Soyer and Chatsworth were quaint in the comic parts, and there was archness in Mdlle. Guichard's Rita. The overture of "Zampa," the chorus of female attendants, the Bacchanal chorus, and the concerted pieces generally, are well known pieces of music, which have deservedly gained for this opera its European celebrity. From beginning to end, the flow of graceful and captivating harmony is continuous; and in many situations the composer exhibits a dramatic power which places him in the first rank of operatic writers. It is deeply to be regretted that his premature decease has left us only the "Pré aux Clercs" and "Zampa" as lasting testimonials of his genius.

HAYMARKET.

An extravagant piece of broad humour, in three acts, under the title of "Leap Year, or the Ladies' Privilege," by Mr. Buckstone, was produced on Tuesday. In explanation of the title, Mr. Buckstone states on the play-bill, that in an old volume, dated 1601, there is a passage purporting to be "An Act to amend the Law of Conveyancing in Leap Year, and to enable that." Albeit it is now become part of the common law in regard to the social relations of life, that as often as every fifteenth year doth return, the ladyes have the sole privilege of making love to the gentlemen, which they do either by words or looks as unto them seemeth proper; and no man will be entitled to the benefit of clergy, who doth refuse to accept the offer of a lady, or who doth in any way trifle with such proffered love, or inconstancy." Mr. Buckstone's play, however, owes little to this suggestion, its main interest depending on an eccentric clause in a will, by which the testator obliges his widow to marry within the year, or, in case of her decease, on pain of his estate going over to a distant kinsman. The lady, Mrs. Clara Fitzroy (Mrs. Keau), is within the two days of the fatal period, and has not yet fixed on a husband, although Miss Sally O'Leary (Mrs. Chatswilliam) has been especially active in procuring candidates for the lady's person and fortune. Meanwhile, the kinsman is urgent, and, by threatening letters and messages, demands the right of taking an inventory, previous to his taking possession, of her effects. Among the candidates affected are a Captain Bunnet (Mr. Selby), who depends upon his person for success. He is a lawyer's son, and, on being ultimately rejected by the lady, makes out a bill of costs, for the expenses of his unprofitable suit, to the tune of seven hundred pounds. Then there is a Mr. Dingle, persecuted by Mr. Buckstone, a fast young man, who promises well, but performs badly. The lady takes him on trial, but he dines out on the very first day, and comes home drunk at night, attended by Captain Bunnet, who dresses him up in a fool's cap and cloak, made out of a parchment deed. This document Mrs Sally O'Leary appears, and finds it to contain proof of her title to some three thousand a year. Last on the list of lovers is Sir Solomon Sobus (Mr. Keeley), a nervous old gentleman, in fear of everything and everybody, principally of his wife. He consults Dr. Ayrton, who believes, on the evidence of astrology, that, unless she is married on a particular day to Sir Solomon, she will die. All these persons are on the occasion of much confusion at Mrs. Keau's house, where her cousin is to be subverted, and could hardly get on with her own part, for laughing at the eccentricities of Mr. Keeley. These gentlemen proving ineligible, the lady is driven to despair, and proposes to commit suicide, rather than marry her kinsman. His answer is decided—he "will have all or none." She then bethinks herself of the remarkably kind attendance of William Parker (Mr. Keau), a clerk in the office of the trustees of the estate, and, with a constant anticipations of her slightest wishes had created an unsuspected interest in her heart. Her pride revolts—but love at last prevails; when the footman turns out to be the lady's cousin, who has adopted the disguise, in order to try the lady's character, and save her fortune, by becoming her husband, should she prove worthy of his attachment. The success of the piece large y depended on Mrs. Keau's acting of the lady, which consisted of a respectful deference, only varied by the recital of poetic extracts, of which she is fond, and by attempts as to imply a declaration of his passion. Mrs. Keau had several delicate points to evolve—the struggle between pride and love—together with some situations of friendship and pathos. The first she rendered with the true feminine gentleness, and yet with pathetic force. Having, in the height of the conflict, suddenly discharged her footman, and time pressing, she is fain to accept the assistance of the supposed clerk, and not even the attention of Blaxetyle, by first wooing the discarded servitor. He meets her more than half way; and, by making a full disclosure, reconciles at once her love and pride.

The drama throughout was admirably performed; nevertheless, it proved occasionally very tedious, owing to the subordinate humours being too elaborately worked out. The scene in Selby's office was good, when reduced in quantity, will tell better. At the conclusion, the curtain was raised again at the call of the house; and Mr. Buckstone announced the piece for repetition every evening.

Mrs. Glover is advertised at the STRAND Theatre, as performing there for her last season, previous to her retirement.

On Wednesday, the "Clandestine Marriage" was performed at Sadler's Wells. "Catherine" was, on the same evening, repeated with an improved cast; Donna Alda being by Miss Gyn, and Martino by Miss Fitzpatrick.

"THE POST-OFFICE LONDON DIRECTORY, 1850."—Half a century's existence has enabled the successive proprietors of this volume to render it, beyond comparison, the most complete work of its class ever yet produced. Within its 2000 closely-printed pages are systematically arranged the several phases of the leading interests of our mighty Metropolis, including the public offices and employés, indicating the position of each; the Street Directory, with the names of the dwellers in each street or place; the Commercial and a Court Directory, alphabetically arranged, a classification of the 2000 trades; a Law Directory, a Clergy list, a mass of information relating to Parochial Members of Government; a Banking, Conveyance, and Postal Directory—the latter specially full of instructions on money orders, and the transmission of letters and newspapers to all parts of the world, &c. The arrangement of this vast mass of information (facilitated in many cases by double references) renders the volume a system of Directories, with the advantage of being in one volume. Assiduity, and unceasing attention to the correction of each successive issue, have contributed to render this work co-extensive in comp etness with its bulk; and when we recollect how Fashion relies upon Commerce for the supply of her artificial wants, and how the latter obtains the necessary capital from the luxurious classes, we may conclude there to be not a class to which this huge volume will not be useful—whilst to a great proportion it will be indispensable.

BANVARD'S PANORAMA.—On Saturday, Louis Philippe and his family visited Banvard's Panorama of the Rhine, in Piccadilly, and appeared to express himself highly gratified with the exhibition, especially with the accuracy of the scenery of the painting.

MANSION HOUSE.—On Tuesday evening, a dinner was given by the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress to his civic brethren and their ladies. Covers were laid for seventy. Amongst the guests were Lord John Russell, M.P., J. Masterman, Esq., M.P., and Miss Stone, the Lord Mayor of York and Miss Wilkinson, the Mayor of Stafford, Sir John and Lady Key, Sir Wm. Curtis, Miss Magnay, Sir George and Lady Carroll, Sir James Duke, Bart., M.P., and Mrs. Hill, Mr. Alderman Farebrother and the Misses Farebrother, Mr. Alderman Humphrys, M.P., and Mrs. Humphrys, Mr. Alderman Bires, Bart., M.P., Col. T. Reynolds, Mr. Alderman Hooper and Mrs. Hooper, Mr. Alderman Musgrove and Mrs. Musgrove, Mr. Alderman Moon and Miss Moon, Mr. Alderman Carden and Mrs. Carden, Mr. Sheriff Lawrence and Mrs. Lawrence, Mr. Sheriff Nicoll and (by-an-by) Mrs. Allen, the Commissioner of Police, C. Pearson, Esq., M.P., Mr. Under-Sheriff Millard and Mrs. Millard, Mr. Under-Sheriff Wire and Mrs Wire, J. T. Delane, Esq., the Rev. Charles Marshall (chaplain to the Lord Mayor) and Mrs. Marshall, W. D. Starling Esq., D. H. Stone, Esq., &c. After the dinner a magnificent display was given in the Egyptian Hall to about 500, who had been previously invited. Supper was served in the old hall-room at twelve o'clock, and the company separated at a late hour of the morning.

BRITISH BENEFICENT INSTITUTION.—The Duke of Leeds, the Marquis of Anglesey, the Marquis of Thomond, the Marquis of Stafford, the Earl of Ellesmere, the Right Hon. Sir Stafford H. Northcote, Bart., Sir Wilmot Horton, K.A., Sir William F. F. Middleton, Bart., Sir Evan Mackenzie, Bart., Sir Henry Marsh, Bart., Sir Felix Agar, James Harmer, Esq., Egerton Warburton, Esq., Major-General Caulfield, and Sir J. Gardner, Bart., have recently joined this valuable charity. His Grace the Duke of Wellington has expressed its intention of presenting to the institution a princely contribution; and amongst the generous donors to the charity are the names of Lord Hardinge, Lord Shrewsbury, Colonel Sir Henry Fairfax, Bart., Sir Arthur Brooke, Bart., M.P., Col. T. Peacocke, Col. James Brander, Sir H. R. Bishop, Sir W. C. Ross, Lieut.-General Sir G. Duncan, C.B., the Bishop of St David's, A. Raphael, Esq. The foundation dinner will be held in the spring, and conducted on a scale commensurate with the importance of this noble charity, from which the most friendless will receive its aid without the aggravation of delay and expenses of canvassing the subscribers, and disconnected from the tricks and evils of public elections, the election being vested in the patrons, vice-presidents, and council only on the recommendation of subscribers. £30 per annum is the annuity which will be paid to an elected.

Amongst recent imports from New York to Liverpool were three novel shipments; namely, 71 tons of logwood, 301 oars, and 45 pipes of port wine. 60 staves have also been remitted.

MUSIC.

MENDELSSOHN'S ORATORIO, "ST. PAUL."

When the style of execution of this magnificent work by the Sacred Harmonic Society in 1837 (Sept. 12), on its first introduction at Exeter-Hall, is remembered, the present interpretation established beyond a doubt the immense improvement of the amateurs. To the advent of Costa as conductor has insured for the performances of sacred compositions, by the great masters, a degree of precision that never could have been anticipated from the Society, composed as it is of a fluctuating body of subscribers. Professional aid—both in the choral and orchestral forces—naturally is of immense importance; but, unless the amateurs had wonderfully advanced in quickness of apprehension, musical knowledge, and sensible ity, it would have been idle to expect the realisation of such fine execution as is now to be remarked. This result proves how much depends on the moral and intellectual influence of the musician who wields the bâton. He must inspire his troops with unbounded confidence, to insure such unity from masses of executants. In the dramatic chorus of Jews and Gentiles, "This is Jehovah's Temple," in A minor, some of the amateur singers and instrumentalists, who had not attended the rehearsals, mistook the beat, and a momentary confusion ensued; but it was instantly met with what presence of mind and promptitude the conductor pulled through the difficulty, and restored order. Now that the concerts of the Society are looked upon by the public as finished art-performances, the rules ought to be stringent not to allow any members to enter the orchestra who have not attended the general rehearsals. Mendelssohn's orchestration is incessant in action, and difficult to play; and as the words in some portions of the oratorio are the essay for the music, it is necessary to retard the time if intelligibility is to be secured. Amongst the splendid choral displays are the "Lord! Thou alone art God," "Stone him to death,' "Arise, Arise," "O! great is the depth," "The nations are now the Lord's," and the finale, "And not only unto Him." The chorales were beautifully done.

Miss Catherine Hayes has fully come up to public expectation by her exquisite vocalisation in "St. Paul." She possesses in an eminent degree the devotional feeling so necessary to give due effect in oratorios. Her intonation is very fine; and, when time is given for consideration, she will leave nothing to be desired. Formes has gained the ground he stood upon by his boisterous singing at the London Wednesday Concerts. He has all the elements of a great singer—dramatic power, feeling, and a noble organ. It may be perceive that he adhered rigidly to Mr. Lockey's dictum, "Sing it like a man." Omitting them all," and his execution somewhat rugged, his pathos in Paul's air of repentance. "Oh, God! have mercy on us," told powerfully on the sympathies of the audience. In the close imitations of the voice by Barrett in this impressive air. Lockey sang with excellent taste the tenor part; and, in the air, "He then faithful," with Lindley's beautiful violoncello obligato, particularly delighted the audience. Miss Dolby's share in the oratorio pieces has always been admired in this oratorio; and Mr. A. Novello's share in the connected music was musician-like. His edition of the oratorio the cheap portable one—we presume—is a brilliant achievement of typography. It has made, and Beneduce and Brindley Richards officiated alternately as conductors, with ability. The vocalists were Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Birch, Miss Rainforth, Miss Poole, Miss A. Romer, Miss Bassano, Miss Dolby, Miss Taylor, Miss Hyde, Miss Hyndaar, the Hungarian Singers, Messrs. Phillips, Leffler, H. Drayton, Harrison, Henry Russell, and Signor Marras. Mr. H. Drayton is new to the public; he is, we understand, an Australian who has studied under Mr. Hobbs. He has a fine voice, more of a baritone than a bass, but he requires practice and cultivation. The only encore during our stay was Phillips, in the song "Shall I vastuye in despair," for which he substituted the air "Total Eclipse."

CLASSICAL SEANCES MUSICALES.—M. Alexandre Billet, the Russian pianist, commenced on Tuesday evening, at the Beethoven Rooms, Harley-street, a series of classical chamber music. M. Billet is a player of the classical school; he is more distinguished for delicacy and precision than for sensiment and power; he performed in Beethoven's trio in B, op. 97, assisted by Molfort and Lidel (violin), Rousselot—in Mendelssohn's quartet B minor, op. 3, with Debeffre (violin), W. Blagrove (viola), and Piatti (violoncello). M. Billet also executed Clementi's sonata in C, op. 38, some of Mendelssohn's songs without words, and a march by Beethoven, for four hands, with M. Levey. Thus M. Billet selected music which displayed the unity of the so admired modern school of pianoforte playing, except the romantic fantasia, which, with all due deference to the pianist, we regard as a style that ought not to be despised. Beethoven and Mendelssohn, Weber and Hummel, Field and Moscheles, in Germany, sang the "Der Freyschütz" scena, and an Ave Maria by Maurice Levy. This has considerable power in the upper part of her register, but she sang too loudly for a small concert-room. Her style, therefore, the sensation she was struggling for. There was a very good attendance. On future concerts, punctuality in the announced time of beginning should be observed.

SONGS OF SCOTLAND.—At Crosby Hall, on Monday night, a new assurance in London. Mr. Milne comes from Edinburgh, under the auspices of Sir James Duke. Mr. Milne has a nice but uncultivated voice; his style lacks vigour, and he does not the dramatic effect of your Wilson in singing sad and comic songs. Miss Julia Smith is, however, very clever; she has a sweet voice, has tact in its management, and is arch and expressive in the Jacobite songs. She was encored in "Bonnie Dundee," and [illegible] being confined to Scottish song. Miss Maria Smith took a part in the duos and trios; and Mr. Frederick Smith was the accompanyist. Tne entertainment evidently gratified the company, for the encores were incessant.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—At Mr. Willy's fourth classical concert, at St. Martin's Hall, last Monday, the programme comprised Beethoven's Quintett in E flat, No. 1; a sonata, by Sebastian Bach, for pianoforte; Mendelssohn's Quintet in D, op. 44; and Mozart's Quartet in G minor. The executants were Sterndale Bennett (piano), Willy and Zerbini (violins), Weslake and Wand (violas), and Reed (violoncello). The vocalists were Misses E. Lyon and Kenneth, with Mr. Land, who sang a tenor song by Gounod, at the fifth concert.—On the 16th inst. was the 13th of the London Wednesday Concerts; the vocalists were Misses Lacombe, Eyles, Poole, Mrs. A. Newton, Messrs. Reeves, Land, Herr Formes; and the soloists, Willy and Ernst.—Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed on Friday, by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, conducted by Surman; the principal singers were the Misses A. and M. Williams, Miss A. E. Byers, Mrs. Sohle; Messrs. Lockey, T. Williams, Frost, Lawler, and Phillips; Mr. H. Blagrove leader, and Mr. T. Foley organist.—The Madrigal Society had their annual festival on Thursday, at Freemasons' Hall.—Mr. Cooper, the principal first violin of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and one of our finest players, has joined the orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera.—Mr. W. Cramer, who has retired, being resident in the county.—The first violins in the band now are Sainton, Henry Blagrove, Dando, Willy, Cooper, Hill, Browne Bezeth, N. Mori, Griffin, and Piatti; Tolbecque, Zerbini, and Doyle: Mr. Webb is the successor of Alsopt (deceased) amongst the violas; and Nicholson has been nominated first oboe in the Philharmonic orchestra, in place of Grattan Cooke, who is one of the band of the Life Guards.—At the concert recently given at Charlottenburg, near Berlin, in presence of the Royal family, pieces from Balfe's "Bondman" and "Bohemian Girl" were sung, accompanied by the composer, who was complimented by the King of Prussia.—Madame Grammann, a contralto pupil of Signor Garcia, has returned to London, after a musical tour in Holland and Belgium.—After "Concertante," Bassini's "Il Barbiere" has been given at the Italian Opera in Paris, with Madame Persiani, Mario, Ronconi, Magnoni, and Ronconi.—A new three-act opera, by Grisar, Horetz by Savvage, entitled "Les Porcherons," has been produced at the Opéra Comique, Paris.—A new grand Philharmonic Society has been formed under the direction of Berlioz, with two hundred executants, vocal and instrumental. The first concert will take place in February.—The Milanese Gazetta Musicale, founded in 1842, which ceased to be published during the late revolution, has re-appeared under the direction of Ricordi.—Romagnesi, a well-known composer of ballads and romances, has just expired in Paris.—At the funeral service of Mr. Bernhard Romberg, Spohr officiated and Gade played Latin words.—Mdlle. Wagner will play Beethoven's Concerto in G, at Mr. Tamburini, Coletti, and Tagliafico, continue their successful career at [illegible] burgh. Mario and Grisi have renewed their engagement for 1851: they will arrive in England about the end of March.—Mdlle. Steffanoni, Salvi, and Marini are creating quite a sensation at the Italian Opera House in the Havannah.

THE REPEALED NAVIGATION LAWS.—A vessel, arrived in the St Katharine-docks from Rotterdam, has brought an entire cargo of rattans, comprising 1000 bundles, and 5000 single canes. This clears away all doubts of East India produce, and would, under the laws of navigation recently in force, have been inadmissible to entry, but are now, under the repeal act which has just come into force, fully entitled to the privilege, among [illegible] imported from Europe. Another vessel has, we find, also arrived at the same docks from Rotterdam, laden entirely with [illegible] bundles, comprising 15,794 bundles of the articles. These are the most interesting and important instances which the reverse winds and bad weather have permitted to occur of the rapid career of the privileges now conferred on shipping generally since the new statute came into operation. It will be further of interest and importance to remark, that the vessels in which these cargoes of East India produce were imported from Europe were British built in both instances.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE ADMIRALTY ENGINEER.—The candidates for the office of Admiralty engineer are daily increasing. Colonel Reid, R E, and Major Veitch, R.E., it is said, are among the number. It is confidently reported, however, that no military man will have the appointment.

It is reported that the department of the surveyor of the navy is to be removed from Somerset House to the Admiralty, Whitehall. It would save an immense deal of time and expense, in the words of the departments of the Admiralty were located in one range of building.

ORDNANCE MEDICAL STAFF.—It is said that a change is about to take place in the management of the army medical department, and that the Ordnance Medical Staff will be incorporated with that of the line. The present Director-General, Sir J. M'Grigor, M.D., has been fifty-six years in the service, for forty of which he has been a member of the Medical Board in London He has £2000 per annum and other allowances.

MILITARY SAVINGS BANKS.—The Secretary of War has notified to regiments having savings-bank that Government is responsible to the several depositors for their respective amounts.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—The Enterprise and Investigator left their moorings at Greenhithe, at half-past eight A.M. on Saturday, the former towed by the Arrogant, and the Monkey steam-vessel. The Enterprise, only, had her compasses adjusted by Captain Johnson, which process occupied from half-past seven A.M. to a quarter to two P.M., and, although the vessel had been nearly two years away from her northern voyage, the arrangements of her iron-work when refitting had been so judiciously made that the deviation was found, on again setting her compasses yesterday, only to have varied a few minutes. A copy of the slight deviation was furnished to the Investigator, and would be a sufficient guide to her, as both were to sail in company with each other. A great number of persons went to Greenhithe to visit the vessels previous to their departure, and seemed much gratified with their visit. Further provisions to their quantities, (to morrow). They will be towed through the Straits of Magheilan, and, close to it at Valparaiso by water, &c., will proceed forthwith to the Sandwich Islands, and thence to Behring's Straits, pushing on to the eastward, in the hope of reaching Melville Island before the winter sets in. Further instructions, however, will be sent to them in the month of March and January.

HEAD-MONEY FOR PIRATES.—The extravagant rate at which the capture or destruction of pirates is rewarded is fixed by Act of Parliament; and the operation of this act was very widely extended by the construction put upon it by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Samarang. The Act by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Samarang. The Act by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Samarang. The large claims lately made for the destruction of pirates in the Indian Ocean has called special attention to the subject, and we have reason to believe that a bill to amend the present act will be introduced immediately after the meeting of Parliament.

REDUCTION IN THE ARMY.—It is stated that the reduction is to be 3400, the vote that is 17 regiments, making now first and second battalions, are to be consolidated and reduced to 1000 men each, the officers to remain en seconde

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The steady continuance of the frost having effectually put an extinguisher upon field sports, and driven those trainers who have not the advantage of a ploughed or tanner gallop, to straw bale, we have only to state that, should the weather permit, there will be a brace of steeple-chases at Wittington Abbey on Wednesday, and consequently at Falkare, Tetherwood, and Gossop on the same day, and at Clydesdale and Aske, on Thursday. There is little prospect of any of these meetings coming off.

TATTERSALL'S.

THURSDAY.—The publication of the Chester Cup weights did not increase the disposition to speculate, but it brought Peep-o'-Day Boy, the Whim colt, Gianca, and Miss Ann into very prominent notice. All Lord Lurgan's horses are scratched. Nothing of consequence done on the Derby. Latest averages:

THE GREAT SEA SERPENT.—The following is an extract from the private log of Captain Edwards, of the Alpha: "Wednesday, May 30, P.M., strong breezes at N.N.W., and a sharp sea on; about 1 15, I felt a strange shaking of the ship Mr. Thomson, my chief officer; Mr. George Park, my engineer, of the ship Mr. Thomson, my chief officer; Mr. George Park, my engineer, and myself, were on deck as well as myself, when we beheld immediately under our lee quarter a monster of huge dimensions. It had no fins or broad tail, as whales have. It was of a light brown colour, with large brown spots behind the shoulders; the head pointed like that of a porpoise. It had large glassy eyes; the shoulder was much darker than the rest of the body, which was the thickest part of it (say twenty feet in diameter), from there diminishing to the tail, to the size of our mainmast in the slings (say twenty-four inches diameter). He took a turn round, and we afterwards saw him astern, and he went away in a S.E. by S. direction, at about half-past six an hour." Hartlepool Free Press, July 1.—A correspondent adds, that when he saw the above, adds that he believes this to be the first time the sea serpent is stated to have been seen so far east.)

NOVEL EXPOSITION.—A novelty in exportation has just been completed by Messrs. Wittnall and Holland, the eminent builders, of Duke street, Bloomsbury. This consists of an entire church, capable of accommodating 300 persons, which is intended to be erected on the rock of Heligoland, for the accommodation of the English residents in that island. The edifice is in the early English style of architecture, from the design of Mr. Benjamin Bervey. It is composed of stone, all of which has been hewn into form on Messrs. Holland's premises. The screen of the chancel is already on its way to St. Helena in the barque Glenlanner. The roof and other wood-work of the building, the iron-works, pavings-sashes, &c., are all complete, and will be shipped on board the vessel in a few days. The dimensions are as follows:—The body of the church is 75 feet long by 30 feet wide; the chancel, 25 feet by 18 feet; the vestry, 10 feet by 10 feet; and a monument-room of the same size. The design includes a belfry and a porch. The pulpit is of carved stone, and the seats of stained pine.

THE GRAND NEW RUSSIAN LOAN.—Mr. Cobden has addressed the following letter to the Reverend Henry Richard, Secretary of the Peace Congress Committee: "103, Westbourne-terrace, Monday evening, January 14th 1850. My dear Sir,—Another occasion is to be offered in the near future of the cupidity of the world. It is said that a Russian loan is to be raised in the City of London. The Cossack hordes have fulfilled their mission in Hungary whenever her wasted fields, her smoking villages, and her sacrificed flowers with the blood of her noblest patriots; and now the savage instruments of all this devastation and slaughter are clamorous for their wages. Englishmen—ay, the capitalists of London—are, it seems, to furnish the blood-money! If so, for the credit of the age and the character of our Christian country, let an indignant protest be heard in reprobation of this unholy and infamous transaction. The Peace Congress Committee, to whom we entrusted the carrying out of the resolution, passed at Paris, condemnatory of these loans, will, I hope, call a public meeting in the City, at which I will most gladly attend. Let it be at the earliest possible moment—Friday or Saturday, at the latest. And this flowing, faithfully yours, RICHARD COBDEN. Rev. Henry Richard, Secretary, Peace Congress Committee." The loan, which has called forth the just indignation of the whole civilized world, was first announced in the City on Monday last, the amount is £5,000,000 sterling, bearing 4½ per cent. annual interest, and it is negotiated by Messrs. Baring Brothe s and Co.

RELIEF OF METROPOLITAN DESTITUTION.—On Tuesday the City Kitchen was opened for the relief of the distressed, and on that day 1000 pints and potatoes were plentifully distributed. At the Leicester-square Soup Kitchen, 1 am-yard, Great Windmill-street, 1500 poor creatures were relieved. At the Model Soup Kitchen, Bath-street, New-road, upwards of 600 were relieved. At the Westminster Soup Kitchen, Low Ham-street, Broad Sanctuary, upwards of 900 were furnished with food. The Mary-chone, Finsbury, and Spitalfields Benevolent Associations commenced their distribution of bread, meat, and coals. A society of benevolent individuals are about to fit up several of the arches of the South-Western Railway, in Lambeth, as a shelter for the houseless during the present inclement season. On Monday night no fewer than twelve individuals were found in the streets overcome by the intense cold.

A NEW POLICE BARRACK.—The Commissioners of Police are now constructing an extensive reserve police-barrack, contiguous to the old St. James's watch-house, Vine-street, Piccadilly.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

IOTA City-road Chess-club. The match now pending betwixt Mr G Medley and Mr Hatherwite, the latter giving the Pawn and move as altogether in favour of Mr Medley, who has won three out of the seven games played

C P C, City-road Chess-club.—Very acceptable, always provided they have not appeared elsewhere

ECONOMIST.—What would you have? The smaller sets of the "Staunton Chess-men," in ebony and boxwood, with their beautiful accompaniments, and attention on the game, sell for 5s. 6d. Now we had the Carton Pierre sets—pieces, as an elegant table ornament, to be cheap at a guinea; the "Text-Book" sells for 3s, making together £1 4s, actually leaving the price of the men themselves at only 11s!

SAXON.—La Bourdonnais died on the 13th day of December, 1840

DERBYON and others will please to bear in mind that communications which reach us later than Wednesday morning cannot be replied to till the next week

S N, Highgate.—How do you effect mate in five moves, if Black for his first coup play K takes K P?

F S suggests that it would be a great improvement in the smaller sets of the new Chessmen in ebony and boxwood, if they, like the Club sets, were loaded at the base. We quite agree with him and are pleased to find his suggestion has been anticipated by Mr Lenard, of Pissall Street, where the men (pulled and clothed with green cloth) may be obtained at a merely nominal advance on the original price

BELLARY.—Your Problem No. 1 is unsolvable, as the White King at the first being in check by the Black Bishop No 2 is pretty, but very easy

H M P.—Many thanks for your kind wishes. The solution as usual, is correct

HODDESDON.—It is not allowable to Castle when your King is in check

SIGMA.—There must be another amendment of the rule to answer our demurrer. For supposed R to K 8th; 2. K to his Sd. 3 B to Q 8 6th (ch); 4. P to Q Kt 4th—Mate. The good game is clever and entitled to publicity. With regard to Problems which hinge upon the first player's next, we have seldom expressed an opinion. They have always appeared to us unsatisfactory; and although we have occasionally inserted one in deference to the wishes of our readers, it has never been with such a twinge of conscience

A BEGINNER.—For much more rudimentary matter you should consult some treatise on the game. See page 23 and diagram 9 of the "Chess-Player's Handbook"

R V.—It appears to us that in your last Problem the Black King may move to his 6th sq at his second move, and thus delay the mate

F W., Ambridge Wells. The two solutions mentioned are perfectly correct. Try them once more

CHISELLING.—In diagram No 39 of the "Text-Book," Black cannot win if White play properly. Let us suppose—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
1 P to B 6th	R to K 3d	3. K to K B 4th
2 K takes P (ch)	R takes R

This is the correct move and enables White to draw the game easily. In diagram No. 19, the pieces require no alteration

H. HC.—We doubt the correctness of your second solution of Problem No. 312; but it is so illegible that we can hardly make it out

DUMFRIESIAN.—It is evidently the game of two inexperienced players

PRIVATE PUPIL.—See our notice to a DEVONSHIRE PLAYER in the last Number

B B.—What are the conditions of the Problem sent for inspection? You have forgotten to give them

Z Z Z.—In Castling on the Q's side, you move your King to the Q B's sq, and the Q Rook to the Q's square. It is not customary in this country to say "Check" when you attack the adverse Queen

J R I.—Acceptable although unequal to many of your former efforts

M P.—Forward as suggested, but we don't purchase a set of the new Chess-Men with a view first examining the bulk of the box and board. Your letter addressed to the Editor, and not to any individual, will be sure to meet with attention

Solutions by W R, R V, JUVENTUS, ELIZA, S U, OMICRON, M R R, W W, B S, are correct. Those by PAX. M P, J P, TWEEDSIDE, B A, FIELD-CHESS, ARMAND, are wrong

J P, Hythe.—You are altogether mistaken

JUVENTUS They shall be looked to

R V.—A distinction only, without any difference

P B. Both shall be reported on next week

BELLARY.—Has sent for his good wishes

B W P, S B, TYRO, SIGMA.—Intelligible

G M G.—Pretty, but too easy

The game was prolonged for some time, but ended as a drawn battle.

(a) If he had taken the Pawn, White would evidently have gained a piece by checking with his Q at her Kt 5th. &c.

(b) He was to ward black against

(c) Looking as Q Kt was to have been fatal to White, as the young player will soon discover on taking out the game

(d) He was undoubtedly to have taking the Kt on account of the threatening situation of Black's Q and Rook, which prevented the retreat of the White Bishop.

(e) By taking with the Q Rook White could secure the certain gain of a piece, and that, particularly, was the most prudent play to adopt; he preferred, however, the few second, but apparently more attacking move of taking with the K Rook, and ought to have lost the game for his temerity

(f) Better play, we think, to have taken the B with the Rook.

(g) Very well played.

(h) He has no better move, and is lucky to draw the game after this.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Mr. Charles Villiers, who annually proposed the repeal of the Corn-Laws, will move the Address in reply to her Majesty's speech at the commencement of the ensuing session, and Sir James Duke will second the Address, in the House of Commons.

The Court of Directors of the East India Company have contributed the sum of £300 towards Mr. Sidney Herbert's fund for the Promotion of Female Emigration.

A few days since, as the gamekeeper of W. J. Watts, Esq., of Teignmouth, was shooting at Kingskerswell, two partridges flew across the road, and immediately afterwards two crows. Each crow killed his bird and the keeper picked them both up.

A strong effort will be made, in the coming session of Parliament, to obtain a repeal of the tax on advertisements. Looked at from any point of view, it is a tax as perhaps the pettiest and most unjustifiable on the Chancellor's list. Its advantage as a source of revenue bears no tolerable proportion to its disadvantages in other respects.

At a very grand Court ball at Brussels, last week, the Duke de Brabant, the Count de Flanders, and the Princess Charlotte were present; and for the first time joined in a quadrille. The extreme grace of the young Princess at this her first introduction excited general admiration.

The Deputy Adjutant-General in Dublin has issued a circular to the effect that the men belonging to infantry regiments serving in Ireland should be permitted to carry only 40 rounds each, of service ammunition, in their pouches, the remaining 30 rounds to be lodged in store in charge of the sergeant of each company, ready for immediate issue whenever circumstances rendered it necessary.

The ship Columbus, A. Hatton, master, which loaded in the West India Docks with a cargo for Bombay, and cleared out from London on the 31st ult., having put into the port of Ramsgate in distress, part of her cargo has been transhipped into the vessels John and Pandora, for the purpose of being rerumed to the West India Docks, to which place the ship will also be towed by steamers as soon as it can conveniently be done.

The example of the Cape is producing its effects. Accounts from Melbourne, Port Phillip, dated the 17th of August, mention that a few days previously a vessel arrived at that port with 300 convicts on board, who were not allowed to land, and were sent off to Sydney. There was to be a great anti-transportation meeting held in the theatre immediately.

A new profession has been discovered at Paris. It is called the Ramasseur d'insultes. "You are a perfect specimen, Mr Judge, said the ingenious inventor to a police magistrate, by whom he was then consulted, "with that profession. I will tell you what it is. In the evening I distribute, at the corners of streets, on the most fashionable nights, and packing up the drunken invalides, take them home to their hotel, where I receive twenty sous for my trouble. In this way I pick up, Mr. Judge, a very decent livelihood."

THE ARTISAN'S HOME, SPITALFIELDS.—THE COFFEE-ROOM.

THE ARTISAN'S HOME.

THE directors of the Metropolitan Association (incorporated by Royal charter) for Improving the Dwellings of the Industrious Classes (by whom the extensive range of dwellings for families was erected, some years since, in Old St. Pancras-road) have, during the past year, extended their operations to one of the most crowded districts of Spitalfields; where they have undertaken the erection of a large building for single men, and dwellings for sixty families, upon a plot of land in Albert-street, Spicer-street, not far from the brewery of Messrs. Truman, Hanbury, and Co. The building for the men has been recently completed, and was formally opened by a public meeting held on the premises, on the 12th of December, when the Earl of Carlisle presided. (A report of the proceedings was given in our Journal of December 15, 1849.)

The plan is arranged for the accommodation of 234 inmates, whose comfort is provided for by all the details and appliances of a modern club-house. It may be described in general terms as a large structure of five stories in height, inclusive of a basement; the three upper stories being fitted with sleeping compartments; the ground-floor devoted for day use; and the basement contains baths, wash-house, larders, and extensive cellarage for coals, stores, &c. But a better idea will be formed of the advantages it affords, by a more detailed mention of the accommodation to which its inmates are entitled.

Any respectable single man of the working classes, on payment of three shillings to the Superintendent, and a small sum as a deposit for articles of crockery, &c., becomes a tenant for one week, and receives two keys, a larger and smaller. The larger of these opens the sleeping compartment on the upper stories, the number of which corresponds with that stamped on the bow of the key (it will unlock no other). On closing the door, he finds himself in a space eight feet in length, by four feet six inches in width, lighted by half a window (which he can open or shut), and furnished with a substantial iron bedstead, clean bedding, a clothes-box (unlocked by the smaller of his keys), clothes-pegs, and looking-glass. There is also the means of admitting fresh air under his clothes-box, which he can regulate at pleasure. The framing of his compartment is not carried up to the ceiling, so that the long ward in which it is situated can be readily ventilated. Ample provision for washing is afforded him, in lavatories, two on each story, fitted with enamelled basins, towels, and every requisite. On leaving his sleeping apartment, he descends a stone staircase to the ground-floor, where he enjoys the free use of three large apartments, the principal of which is a spacious and well-lighted coffee-room, with an open roof of stained timbers, supported by cast-iron columns, the general appearance of which is shown in the accompanying Engraving. The tables are arranged in boxes, and here is supplied coffee, or a more substantial meal, according to a fixed scale of charge. On one side of the coffee-room is the reading-room, 60 feet in length, provided with newspapers and a library of books. On the other side of the coffee-room is a large kitchen, in which the lodger can cook for himself at either of its two powerful ranges: or he may be supplied here, as in the coffee-room, with provisions ready cooked. A staircase leads to a portion of the basement fitted up as a larder, where the lodger's smaller key opens one of the 234 safes, arranged on piers.

The whole establishment is under the control of a superintendent, whose office, situated close to the entrance-door, commands a view of the hall, staircase, and door to coffee-room. He has also under his care the stairs to the baths and washhouses on the basement; for the washing department is intended to be used (though at different hours in the day) both by the inmates of this building and those of the dwellings for families now in course of erection. These families are to enter the washhouse by a distinct entrance.

The whole of the building is thoroughly ventilated, the foul air being drawn from all the rooms by an upward current in the ventilating shaft that rises nearly 100 feet, and into which several of the smoke flues of the building are conveyed. There are large cisterns in the roof, and smaller ones in other parts of the building. Every floor has an opening, secured by an iron door, into a dust-shaft, communicating with a dust-cellar in the basement. The premises are well lighted with gas. The water-closets are detached from the main building.

The structure has been erected from the designs and under the superintendance of Mr. William Beck, architect, by Mr. S. Grimsdell, builder.

PRIZE EXHIBITION AT THE GOVERNMENT SCHOOL OF DESIGN, SOMERSET-HOUSE.

ON Wednesday the annual distribution of prizes took place, on which occasion an exhibition was made of the drawings, paintings, modellings, and designs of the students, executed in the school during the last year. They were for the most part highly creditable to the various aspirants.

The meeting for the distribution of the prizes was most numerously attended. The Right Hon. Henry Labouchere, M.P., President of the Board of Trade, acted as chairman, and was ably supported by Lord Granville.

The report having been read by the secretary, the chairman proceeded to enlarge upon the importance of the arts of design to our manufacturing success, and to point out the necessity of our continued improvement, in order to our maintaining the relative position of England in regard to the world. He complimented highly the pupils on the merit of the drawings and other specimens of industrial skill, exhibited in the adjoining rooms—which he stated had gained not only his good opinion, but that of persons especially competent to judge of their peculiar excellence. The female pupils, in particular, had been singularly successful. He then alluded to the intended public exposition of 1851, under the auspices of the Prince Consort; and recommended the scholars to compete for the honour of earning a place in it, as equally creditable to themselves and the country.

The prizes were then distributed. They were exceedingly numerous. Those awarded to the female students were especially interesting—they were for designs. Many had more than one prize. Alice West and Louisa Garm had six prizes each; Eliza Mills, four; Jane Thomas, Charity Palmer, and Amelie Carey, two each. The following had one:—Tread, Susan Ashworth, Jane Edgley, La Soliel, Rogers, Thatcher, A. Dale, Verral, Charlotte Rees, Sabrina Morley, L. Burrows, Turner, Wilson, Hipwood, Reynell, Cross, Mateaux, Taylor. The prizes in this class amounted altogether to £37 5s. No less than £35 was awarded to the elementary school in drawings. The names of the successful candidates were E. H. Cousins, Wigzell, Willett, Lindsay, R. H. Burden, J. Hyland, R.W. Hutchinson, B. Young, Blandford, Watkins (two prizes), Dollery, Duke, J. Robinson, Johnson, Stanham, Butler, Fares, Kell, Patch, Groves, Robinson, Ford, Bell, Slocombe, Edmonds, and Collier.

FOR WORKS MODELLED the names of the successful candidates were—Harsken, Wills sen. and jun., Vounes, Jackson, Wardell, Breers, Thompson, Elliott, Easterling, and J. Adams.

FOR DRAWING.—Browne sen. and jun., H. Daves, Atkinson, Ireland, M. Wigzell, Austin (two prizes), Breeze, C. Kirkley, Ford, Cuthbert, Legge.

FOR DESIGNS.—Gould, Allbridge (two prizes), Pitcher, Lanchwick, Bell (two prizes), Dresser, Mays (three prizes), Slocombe (two prizes), Hodder, Rasmback, Cuthbert, Moore, M'Cullum, Raimbach, J. George, Town (two prizes), Ruthven (two prizes), J. Cotchelt, J. B. George, Hanson (two prizes), Rawlings, Estall, Hyland (two prizes), and Horne.

FOR WORKS IN COLOUR.—George Lait (two prizes), Smith, Town (two prizes), Ford, Arthur, Bens (two prizes), Arthur Maschin, Hodgetts, Hodder, Goodbarne, M'Cullum, Franks, Ferrier, Wyatt, Armytage (two prizes), Hodges, Nickisson, Hewitt, Mays, and Grisebach.

FOR PAINTING FRUIT AND FLOWERS.—Cotchelt (two prizes), Mays, Armytage, Brook, and Goodbarne.

The sum of the prizes awarded to the male students amounted to £209; to which was added a gift by Lord Granville (as we understand) of £30; which, with the £37 5s. distributed amongst the female students, amounted altogether, to £296 5s.

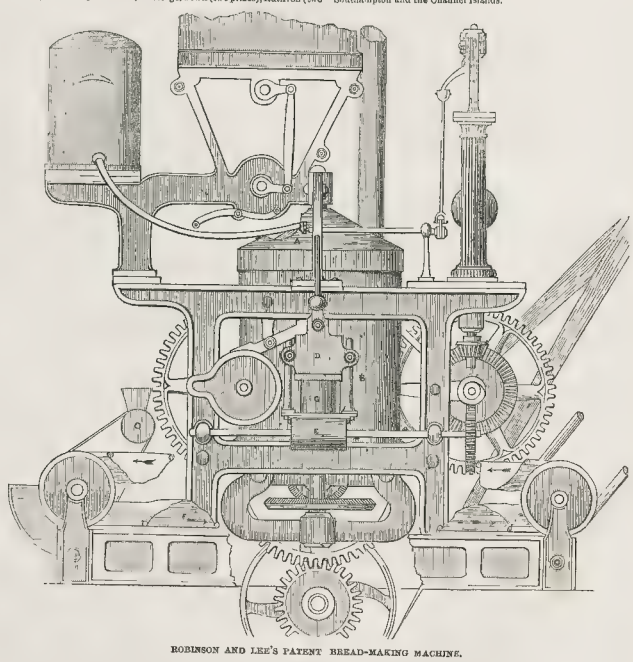
Mr. Redgrave and Lord Granville then addressed the meeting—both on the subject of the excellence of the French in the arts of design. Hare, however, it would be easy for English invention soon to rival that of our neighbours. But the real difficulty lay in the superiority in France of the art-workman. In England, it was a hard matter to find the means of realizing a design, when invented, from the want of skill in our operative branches.

Thanks were then accorded to the chairman; and the company proceeded to inspect the adjoining apartments that contained the Exhibition.

SALE OF THE AUTOGRAPH OF MILTON.—On Monday the sale by auction of the library of the late Mr. John Poynder, one of the county magistrates for Surrey, which was commenced on Thursday week, was concluded at the auction-room of Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson, Wellington-street, Strand, when among the property disposed of was the first edition of the plays of the immortal Shakespeare and an autograph of the illustrious Milton, &c. The work to which was attached the autograph of Milton was entitled "Arati Solenses Phænomena, cum scholiis Gr.," which had been in his possession, and which, in itself, was of no particular value. The autograph signature was as follows:—"Jo. Milton. Pre 2s 6d; 1631." On the title-page were the words "Cum sole et luna semp. aratus eri." There were also numerous autograph annotations interspersed throughout the book. After an active competition the lot was sold for £40 10s. The first edition of the plays of Shakspeare was knocked down for £35 10s.

THE BONAPARTE FAMILY.—We find the following in the Siècle:—"If we are well informed, family affairs occupy a considerable degree of attention at the Elysée at this moment. The Minister of Justice is said to have been charged to examine a quest on which he had himself submitted to the consideration of a commission composed of eminent lawyers, such as M. Dupin, sen., M. Portalis, M. Barthe, M. Troplong, &c. It is this—The treaty of Fontainebleau, corroborated by the will of the Emperor, secured to the Bonaparte family claims on the public treasury for considerable sums, which, with interest, would now amount to more than twenty millions. The Restoration, considering the treaty of Fontainebleau as abolished both by right and by the events of war, paid no attention to the claim. At the time of the revolution of July, claims were sent in to the new Government by the members of the Bonaparte family, who were then in exile; the Council of State were called on to examine these demands, and presented a favourable report. But the Government of Louis Philippe did not think it its duty to attend to these claims, which are now again renewed. The commission to which M. Rouher has submitted the question is, it is said, inclined to regard the question in the same light as the Council of State of 1831; and it is on the opinion of this special commission that the Government will present a bill tending to effect the reimbursement of the sums which may be due by France to the heirs of the Emperor, after it has been subjected to the examination of the Council of State."

A valuable and splendid service of silver plate, weighing between two and three hundred ounces, and also a gold watch, chain, &c., have been presented to Captain George Babat, at the Chamber of Commerce, Jersey, by the inhabitants of the Channel Islands, as a testimonial of their marked approval of his public conduct during the period of twenty-two years that he has been employed in the command of steam-ships trading to and from the port of Southampton and the Channel Islands.



ROBINSON AND LEE'S PATENT BREAD-MAKING MACHINE.

PATENT BREAD-MAKING MACHINE.

ANY means of economising, by mechanical improvement, the process of Bread-making, will, we are persuaded, be of general interest; and such we are induced to consider the Machine here engraved.

Fig. 1 represents a front view of a Bread-Machine recently erected in Glasgow, under Messrs. Robinson and Lee's patent. One ton and a half of loaf bread, or a ton of biscuit, is produced by this invention hourly, without the intervention of human labour in any stage, although the machine itself occupies less than a square yard of space. It is well known that the process of setting the sponge, in the common mode of bread-making, consumes a considerable period of time, and occasions great waste of the nutritive qualities of the flour. The patentees of this Machine state that they prevent both these losses by the use of carbonated water, which can be very cheaply prepared; but the Machine is equally adapted for those who prefer yeast in the manufacture of bread. By a very simple but ingenious process, the liquid and flour are made to fall together in due proportions upon a cone (A), which partially mixes and conveys them into the kneading-trough (B), whence the dough is forced out at an aperture (C), and cut off by an eccentric knife (D) in the precise quantities wished. Falling upon a roller (E), these pieces are carried by the same machinery through a moulding-tube (F), and thence into the oven (Figs. 2 and 3); where the steam by which the whole concern has been kept moving is, after passing through a red-hot coiled pipe in the furnace (Fig. 4), applied in direct contact with the batch, and produces a very pure crust. The heat, too, is both indicated and regulated by a self-acting pyrometer, whereby the baker can assure his batch against being either burned or slack-baked.

SECOND VERSE.

If in the chambers of thy heart
I yet may hope to dwell,
I'll learn to play some noble part,
That after-times shall tell;

And if among the honour'd dead
My name recorded be,
Perchance some pitying tear you'll shed
O'er him who died for thee.

THE next morning the young barrister was awake with the sparrows thinking to himself how on earth he could get out of this new operabox scrape, with anything like success. The very idea of asking a favour of Lady Verulam, after that decided cut in the Park, was gall and wormwood to his pride, and yet the jeweller with his writ was almost as bitter a draught. To be sure, the fellow could not do anything until next term, so that, even if he did not pay "the villain," he needn't be in the least fear for at least two months to come. Besides, to be poor and appear poor was the very deuce, and he knew very well, that old rouged Cowager would take very good care to let every one know about the accursed box; so perhaps it would be better to pay her, and run the chance with the jeweller.

That morning, an answer filled with apologies and bank notes was dismissed off to her Ladyship; and by the evening, under the shelter of Long Vacation, every trouble was forgotten, and Mr. Wellesley, for a wonder, found his dinner excellent, the coffee capital, and his wife delightful—a thing he had not done for months past. Indeed, every day Mr. Nicholls seemed to gain better and better health and spirits. He began to pay attention both to his dress and to Mrs. Nicholls, and even once took the children out for a walk.

Then, too, the great pigeon match was coming off, and the young barrister had to go down to the Red House every day to see Lively Harry practise. Of course it would never do to go down to such a sporting place in a black coat, dressed like a gentleman, so he had a splendid shooting jacket made, with ten pockets, the buttons very low behind, and a pair of cord trousers that fitted as tight to the legs as bandages, and made him look very like a publican. It is true this made a good hole in the money he had put aside for the butterman, but then there was a very good chance of winning twenty-five pounds, and if one goes to the Red House, why one must do as the Red House does. Besides, it was capital fun down there. Lord Cressey was such a nice fellow, and used to sit chatting with him all day long, drinking his champagne and smoking his cigars, just as if Nicholls had been one of the Guards. The worst of it was, the champagne was rather expensive; but then his Lordship once walked home with him all down Bond-street, and every one kept looking at them in a way that was surely worth a few bottles of champagne.

The only thing that disturbed him in any way was Mrs. Wellesley Nicholls' disgraceful conduct. If he came home at all late, there de was sure to find her sitting up alone and looking as if she was being killed. At last, however, he got over the morbid sentiment of the thing, for Lord Cressey told him it was just the same with his "little woman" at first, but that he very soon knocked the mopes out of her by never coming home at all. The only way, his Lordship said, was to shew 'em that there was no green about you, and swear at 'em a bit; adding, "the women like you all the better for it afterwards." and concluding by proving to the doubtful Nicholls how this conduct had cemented the love between himself and Lady Cressey.

At last the day arrived that was to decide whether Nicholls was to lose his twenty-five pounds or not. Lively Harry had promised to breakfast with him, and they were both to go down to the Red House together. At last he came, full of news and spirits, with his own gun, and, as usual, very thirsty.

For the last week or two, Nicholls had got into the habit of never drinking any thing but bitter ale for breakfast. Sara was, of course, thoroughly disgusted with such conduct, and had spoken rather strongly on the point. But Nicholls had tried Lord Cressey's plan of "swearing at 'em a bit;" and it certainly had quieted her, for she had never breakfasted with him since.

Before Nicholls could eat a mouthful he insisted upon seeing the gun. He didn't know much about guns, but it would never have done for him, in his sporting character, to have passed one by quietly. So he had the gun out, and for about ten minutes did nothing but raise it to his shoulder and take aims at the canary-bird; nor would he leave it until all his questionings, as to it's being a "right-hand barrel," whether it wasn't rather long in the stock," and "a beautiful riser," had been satisfactorily answered.

During the breakfast, Nicholls told a long story of his uncle, "who had such a wonderful gun, sir," that he had bought for fifteen shillings, and would not part with it for twenty pounds;" until the gun was with the guns and the bitter ale, when it was time to start, it was rather doubtful if either of them would prove the "steady shots" they boasted themselves to be.

When they reached the grounds, all was bustle. Everybody looked very much like omnibus cads, and everybody was offering to bet every-body. In a very few minutes Nicholls had taken so many "twos to ones" and "ones to twos" that he didn't exactly know whether, in case everything went right, he should be a winner or a loser. However, it would never do for him as a sporting character to confess his ignorance on the point, so he tried to look pleased and knowing.

The firing was beautiful. Up went the birds, off went the guns, and down came the birds. It was very doubtful who would lose. At last, Lively Harry, somehow or other, missed. He was certain he hit his pigeon—that he could swear to, and he had never seen such an extraordinary thing in all his life. Nicholls, of course, said it was very extraordinary, and began to feel anything but certain that "the young muff, who had been cockering himself up with the idea that he was a crack shot,' wouldn't pocket his five-and-twenty pounds after all.

And so it turned out. Everybody told Nicholls they had never seen Lively Harry shoot so badly; but, as they had nearly all been betting against him, it struck the barrister as being very curious indeed.

What cut him to the quick, too, was, that everybody imagining him to be such a wealthy man—kept telling him that the loss was only a flea-bite to such a man as he was. Lord Cressey, too, offered to double the stakes, and get up another match, saying it was only fair to give Lively Harry another chance.

With the bettings, Nicholls came off rather better: he only lost eight pounds; and, as he luckily had the money with him, he paid it on the spot—and so, thank God! his honour could not be doubted.

As he neared his home, Nicholls grew more and more unwilling to face his wife. He knew what the first question would be; and, after what she had said to him on the subject, he felt how difficult it would be to tell her, with any credit to himself, that the result she had foretold had come to pass. Luckily, however, his wife was out; and Nicholls, delighted at escaping so easily, rushed up-stairs and, locking the door, threw himself on the bed, to think over the tale he was to tell her. As he lay there, he could not help calling to mind the strange part he had for the last month been acting. What had he gained? What had he been working for? He had been forcing himself amongst the society of men whose tastes and habits were directly opposed to his own. He had worked hard to make the run that was hanging over him doubly certain. He had even turned his own house against himself, and had driven his very wife from him—and what for? Merely that the world might see him shaking the hand of a Lord, who, did he but know the misery he sought to hide, would be the first to turn from and spit upon him. Then he vowed to himself, that henceforth he would snap his fingers at the world; and, as soon as ever he could set his affairs a little bit in order, he would start upon quite a new principle altogether.

At five o'clock Mrs. Nicholls returned home, and at half-past five an affecting scene took place in the back parlour; in which Mr. Nicholls, calling himself a scoundrel and a villain, on his "bended knees" begged of his dear Sara to forgive him for his harsh and cruel conduct to her of late. Then sobs were heard, and, after sobs, kisses; and both parties, when they came out, had very red faces, and were both blowing their noses, so as to cover as much as possible of the countenance.

After dinner, Nicholls had his desk brought into the room, and Sara went up-stairs and returned with one long file full of bills delivered, and another very small one of bills receipted. And Nicholls set to work putting down on one side of a large sheet of foolscap, carefully ruled, and headed "The Estate of Wellesley Nicholls, Esq.," all the payments he was debtor to, and on the other all the money he was credited by. When he had finished, it was astonishing to see how full one and how empty the other side of the account was.

"God bless me," cried Nicholls, when the process of adding up had been gone through, "I had no idea we owed so much, my dear. However, there's one comfort that we do know what we owe, and if we can only get a little time we will be all right yet."

But the great misfortune was that Mr. Nicholls was reckoning without his host of creditors; for no sooner was the Long Vacation over, than he was soon convinced, from the extraordinary pace in which summons after summons was fired at him, that the jeweller was in no way inclined to lose the "little time" Mr. Nicholls was so anxious to obtain.

Then the half-crazy barrister saw that the only chance left him, by which to gain this time, was by entering a defence to the jeweller's action, and contesting each step until his next quarterly cheque should arrive. So to work he went, denying "that he was ever indebted" with the most expensive energy, and demanding for time to "shew cause" so repeatedly, that it seemed as if he were seeking to defer judgment until the judgment-day.

One day, when Mr. Nicholls, full of joy at having obtained the last fortnight's delay he should require, reached his house, he was much astonished at seeing congregated round his door-step a small crowd of boys, evidently much delighted at somestrange scene that was being acted at his house. On the other side of the way, too, nearly all the windows that could command a good view of the proceedings were crowded with the heads of servants and families, who all seemed to be vastly entertained by the free exhibition that was going on at the Nicholls'.

As he owed nearly a year's rent, the barrister at first thought it might be that scoundrel of a landlord (for Mr. Nicholls had lately got into the habit of calling all his creditors scoundrels or villans) squaring his accounts, and making his mind easy, by distraining upon his plate basket.

Considerably alarmed at the thought, he hurried on as quickly as he could, and pushing through the congregated boys, rushed into the hall. Then, as his eyes rested on a man with his apron fastened behind with an iron hook, the full misery of his position burst upon him. There stood the butterman, his foot against the wide-open street-door, his arms crossed à la Napoleon, looking the enemy with a strength of lung that would have been invaluable in the electioneering or "fine mackerel" line, but was heartrending in the bosom of a peaceful family.

"Do it! do it!" he shouted to the boy Parker, who had been ordered to turn him out. "Do it, that's all! I want my money! Give me my money! I ain't going to be swindled. Do you hear, I say? I ain't going to be swindled—I've eat my best Dorset, and now I want seven pounds eight shillings as I've worked hard for. Go and tell this to your master, as looks as if my butter wouldn't melt in his mouth." And he looked round him triumphantly, whilst the select audience on the reserved steps cheered him on to greater abuse.

Nicholls, with his face the colour of anchovy paste, hurried past the butterman as quickly as possible, for fear, as he afterwards said, lest he should disgrace himself by knocking the scoundrel down.

"Where's your mistress, Parker?" he asked, as he had safely reached the first step.

"Up-stairs, fainting, please sir," was the answer; and up-stairs Mr. Wellesley N. rushed to supply a little mental smelling salts, and see what on earth could be done to get that fellow out of the house.

Mr. Nicholls's treatment for a case of fainting was as new as it was successful. It consisted in dashing jug-full after jug-full of cold water in the face of the patient. At the first drenching Sara gave evident signs of returning consciousness, and just before the second was applied, she was so far recovered as to sit upright and dart a withering look at her hydropathic husband.

"How much money have you got in the house?" he asked, without the least show of sympathy.

"Twelve and sixpence."

"My God!" And out of the room the wretched man darted.

What on earth was he to do? There was no chance of the fellow taking a bill at a month. He had nothing in the house that he could raise money upon, and there was no time to go to Lively Harry for another acceptance. The only chance he saw was, to conciliate the man by shifting all the blame on to his wife's shoulders. Just then another shout of laughter came from the street, and Nicholls hurried down to do something or other.

Trying to look as unconcerned and haughty as possible, he entered the parlour, and rang the bell violently, until Parker came to answer it.

"Shew that man in here, and then close the street-door," was the order; and, in a second or two, the butterman entered, and the door slammed. "May I ask the reason, sir, why you create this disturbance in my house, sir?" demanded Nicholls, with a look that can be imagined, but never, never described.

Now that he had lost his audience, the man seemed some little bit awed into respect by the splendid furniture and the tremendous look. However, he very soon told all his grievances. Bill delivered eight times within two months; called every day for the last fortnight; everybody always out; said, lastly, a bill to meet on the morrow, and must have his money. As Mr. Nicholls heard this, he gave, at each complaint, a sudden start, to prove how new all this was to him, and how much it took him by surprise.

"God bless me!" at last he cried, rising, "why did not Mrs. Nicholls tell me of this? I shall be introduced to the bailiffs. Excuse me for one minute, if you please," he added, as he left the room, as the butterman clearly saw, with the intention of saying a few words to his negligent wife.

In a minute or two Nicholls returned. "I find all you have said is perfectly correct, and I am only sorry I am very sorry for it. If I had known of it, it should not have happened. What is the amount of your bill?"

"Seven pound eight," answered the butterman, now as mild as his own bacon.

"Dear, dear! I find I have only three or four pounds in the house," cried Nicholls, slightly magnifying the twelve and sixpence. "Would to-morrow suit you?"

"If you could give me a pound or two on account, I should feel very much obliged, sir."

The barrister was in a mess again. He thought for a moment, then replied, "I could, but it would be very inconvenient. Let me see. If I give you a cheque, I suppose you couldn't wait a fortnight."

This very nearly set the butterman off again. He declared he wouldn't be made a fool of any longer—that he would advertise the whole proceeding in the morrow's Times—and threatened to do so many things, that at last Nicholls, afraid he had trod over ground over again to conciliate him, once more rang the bell, and ordered Parker to show the man to the door, threatening, if he caused any further disturbance on his door-step, to give him in charge to the first policeman he saw.

By Heaven I'll work out that seven pounds of mine in a way you won't like, my fine gentleman," cries the man as he dashes his hat on his head; "you've done me out of my money, and cutting much more in this neighbourhood, I can tell you. I know nearly every shop as you deals with, and I'll bet a guinea you'll have such a string of tradors to-morrow as will spoil your night's rest for you." And, shaking his fist at Nicholls, who, white as sea-kale, was trying to look amused with the ruin the fellow was threatening, he darted down the door-steps into the road, where he was joined by one or two of his friends; and, by their frequent pointings at the parlour window, it was evident they were the first to whom the story of Nicholls's "swindling" was being related.

GOING, GOING, BUT NOT GONE.—Every now and then we are startled by a false alarm and we are very happy to find the alarm is a false one—of Lord Denman being about to retire from the Chief Justiceship of the Queen's Bench on account of illness. Whether anybody's wish is father to the thought, or whether nothing is farther from the wish, or whatever the case may really be, it is quite clear that the cry of "Going, going," which is constantly got up in reference to Lord Denman, is one that finds no response in the mind of that distinguished Judge, who is by far too good a judge to resign without reason an office he fills with so much grace, learning, and dignity. The cry is invariably accompanied by the old air of the "Campbells are coming," and if Lord Denman should be, as we are, tired to death of the tune in question, it will be entitled to the names of the tune the Judge died of. We sincerely hope it will never earn such a doleful co-derby. We do not question the propriety of Lord Campbell's succeeding to the Queen's Bench when there is a vacancy; but, notwithstanding his success in "The Lives of the Chief Justices," we hope the life of Lord Denman as Chief Justice will be prolonged, so as to prevent Lord Campbell from having an opportunity just yet of attempting his own.—Punch.

The expenditure of the city parochial board of Edinburgh, in outdoor relief, has, in consequence of the present greater demand for labour, and the cheapness of food, been fully £800 less during the last three months than it was during the corresponding period of last year. In the course of a year, a quarterly saving to this amount would come to upwards of £3200, being a reduction of more than 30 per cent.

COUNTRY NEWS.

AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION.

Protectionist meetings and dinners are continued throughout the country with unremitting frequency.

A public dinner took place on Monday at the Court-house, Warwick, for the purpose of giving expression to the feelings entertained by the friends of Protection to British industry in the county of Warwick, in favour of the introduction, in the next session of Parliament, of measures calculated to mitigate the evil of the existing Free-Trade system. The tables were arranged in the large room of the Court-house, but, in consequence of the great demand for tickets, it was found necessary to provide further accommodation; and, accordingly, tables and seats were added to accommodate about sixty additional guests were laid in the large room below, the company crowding into the great room up-stairs, as soon as the dinner was over, to hear the addresses that were delivered. Shortly after 5 o'clock, the chair was taken by the Hon. Charles Bertie Percy, of Guy's Cliff; and immediately near him we observed the Earl of Warwick; Lord Guernsey, M.P.; C. N. Newdegate, Esq., M.P.; R. Spooner, Esq., M.P.; Sir Francis Goodricke, Bart.; C. M. Caldecott, Esq., of Holbrook Grange; R. Granville, Esq., of Wells-borne; H. C. Wise, Esq.; Matthew Wise, Esq., Leamington; J. M. Boultbee, Esq., Springfield; J. Meredith, Esq., Leamington; James Taylor, Esq., of Moseley Hall; Captain Musgrave; J. R. West, Esq., Alscott; W. J. Harrington, Esq.; J. Shakespeare, Esq.; Captain Heath; R. J. Barnewall, Esq.; B. Granville, Esq., Captain Conyngham; J. H. Sheldon, Esq.; Colonel Freer; Thomas Gladstone, Esq., of Grove Park; W. Holbeach, Esq., of Farnborough; and upwards of two hundred other gentlemen and tenant-farmers of the county. Several animated speeches and toasts were delivered, in accordance with the objects of the assemblage.

On the same day, a numerous meeting of farmers and others resident in Hampshire was held in the Market Hall, Bothley, for a similar purpose. Mr. J. Warner, of Steeple Court, filled the chair.

On Saturday last, the members of the Illminster district of the Somerset County and General Conservative and Protectionist Association assembled at the George Hotel, Crewkerne, for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the association, in that district, of considering the present distressed condition to which the agricultural interest is reduced by the mischievous operation of Free-Trade legislation. The chair for the occasion was provided with a new one. The chair was taken by Thomas Hussey, Esq., late M.P. for Lyme, who is the lord of the manor of Crewkerne. He was supported by the most influential agriculturists of the neighbourhood. Speeches, toasts, &c., of a Protectionist character followed the withdrawal of the cloth.

On the same day (Saturday) a meeting of landowners, tenant-farmers, labourers, &c., was held at the Town Hall, East Retford, Notts., and was crowded to excess. There were present persons from all parts of the county, and the various resolutions were adopted with perfect unanimity. Lord Henry Bentinck, M.P., the Viscount Galway, M.P., the Hon. Captain Duncombe, M.P., Sir Thomas Wilde, Bart., W. H. Barrow, Esq., Richard Mitward, Esq., &c., took part in the proceedings.

On Tuesday morning, at Lewes, at a well-attended meeting of the agriculturists of the county of Sussex, the following resolutions were proposed and carried:

That the agricultural, colonial, and other interests of this country are at the present moment, from various causes, suffering and difficulty, and are fast becoming to a most fatal condition of general distress and ruin, from which nothing but a total change in the system of the Free-Trade policy, to which their position is attributable, be wholly abandoned, and a system of just protection to domestic industry against foreign competition be substituted.

That the agriculture of is a kingdom is one of its most vital interests, and that its destruction must inevitably be followed by the ruin of our commercial and manufacturing interests; that the Free-Trade policy of the present Government has signally failed; that it has injured the shipping interest, and in short, and will involve, the agricultural interest and all other classes in great distress, privation, and ruin.

That a loyal and dutiful address be presented to the Queen, praying that her Majesty will exercise her Royal prerogative in dissolving the present Parliament, from which no hope can be entertained of obtaining a reversal of the fatal policy under which the whole country is suffering; and that her Majesty will thereby afford to the British people the opportunity of securing a House of Commons composed of men who entertain sentiments in harmony with the people, and will uphold the interests of the great mass of her Majesty's loyal subjects throughout the empire, and who would support an Administration based on the principle of equal justice to every interest throughout the country.

That the address to the Queen should be entrusted to the Duke of Richmond for presentation.

The chair was occupied by Sir H. Shiffner, Bart.; and on the platform were Mr. Frewen, M.P., Lord Sheffield, Mr. R. S. Streatfield, the High Sheriff, Mr. Walter Russell, the Rev. Mr. Ellman, the Rev. J. Turner, and other gentlemen of local influence.

EXTENSIVE SAVINGS-BANK DEFALCATIONS.

Another very serious case of fraudulent appropriation of public money has been discovered within the last few days, the large sum of at least £10,000 having been abstracted by the actuary of the St. Helens Savings-Bank by the very same means as those adopted by Mr. Hawkins, keeping a duplicate set of books, one (private) showing the actual state of the financial affairs of the bank, the other (public) "cooked" to suit his purposes. And, strange enough to say, it appears that a portion of this fraud was brought to light and commenced certainly in the year 1838, if not before, and most likely has been carried on for twenty years without being discovered!

The St. Helens Savings-Bank was established at the close of the war, about the year 1818, in the town of St. Helens, near Liverpool, to receive the cash deposits of persons residing within a district of five miles round the town. The business has been carried on from the commencement to the present time in a building in Market-street, the days of attendance being Monday in each week, from twelve to two o'clock. The management was vested at the time in six trustees, elected from the magistracy or the leading families of the town and neighbourhood; and the actuary, a managing, selected from a responsible and respectable tradesman in the town, who allowed their names to be used for the benefit of the bank, and agreed to attend in rotation, to superintend the business, and to affix their initials to the deposit-books as the deposits of the week were received. At the same time Mr. John Johnson, then about thirty years of age, was appointed actuary, and has continued so up to the period when the disclosures just made showed us that no longer worthy of such important trust and office. His remuneration was by commission upon the receipts, and might be about £50 per annum, for which, latterly, attendance was given for little more than an hour per week. About twelve months ago he introduced William Johnson, his younger brother, then about 26 years of age, as sub-actuary. Mr. J. Johnson, the actuary, is the managing partner in the firm of Johnson, Worthington, and Co., the proprietors of several collieries in the neighbourhood of St. Helens, and especially of a very valuable one known as "The Sankey Brook Colliery."

Mr. Johnson and his brother were natives of St. Helens, have resided there all their lives, and were looked upon as respectable men, and persons in whom confidence might be placed, more especially as they were in good circumstances. Suspicion was first excited a few weeks back, at the annual meeting of the trustees and managers, when Mr. Johnson, as actuary, laid before them a financial statement. The dividends declared for the last year were much larger more closely than usual, and they were much surprised to find that, though the population of the district, and the trade of the town, had so vastly increased during the last year, no additional additions had been made regularly enough, and that the operatives were well employed, that still the business of the bank was decreasing. Further inquiry, and the calling in of the depositors' pass-books, to compare them with the ledger, have disclosed the fraudulent practices of the Messrs. Johnson.

The total amount of defalcation, speaking from data which have been collected, is above £10,000, or rather, we should say, that sum will clear it, and it is believed Mr. Johnson and his brothers have sufficient property to cover it. The amount of the bank liabilities have been represented as £14,000: it is supposed they should be £23,000. The number of accounts is 600, the majority are small sums of about £20; and of these 300, or one-half, are deposited, are incorrect; the accounts tampered with are those of friendly societies, of which there are several, and those of persons who put their money in the bank rather as an investment than for general operating with. The largest account standing to any friendly society's account yet discovered is from the "Back-Bone Society," one of the oldest and richest in the town; their account is £630 deficient. One instance of the extraordinary confidence of Mr. Johnson's depositors is singular as to deserve special notice. A person residing at some distance from Lancashire was a depositor before the alteration of the law, and was therefore entitled to put in, and receive the rent upon, property to the amount of £300. He had, in fact, above £300 in the bank. He was accustomed to ask money of the manager, and not wishing to let the man know the total amount, he left his pass-book in the hands of Mr. Johnson, who possessed his fullest confidence. When the book was returned to the depositor, it was found that the deposits were regularly entered, but that Mr. Johnson, depending upon the account not being meddled with, as it was there for investment, had withdrawn the whole! Though the trustees have not got their accounts, there can be no doubt that they were carried on by means of duplicate books, and Mr. Johnson appears to have regularly entered and paid interest, from some source or other, upon the amounts abstracted to the accounts from which they were taken, and also to have made an account straight when he found the parties in whose name it stood were about to alter it, and there was danger of an exposé. This, however, he effected by merely taking sufficient from some other account, or, in common phraseology, "robbing Peter to pay Paul." Of course, the sub actuary, his brother, who kept the books, was cognizant of all this, as he admits, and actually effected the transfer, but he denies that he got any pecuniary benefit from it.

SCARBOROUGH SAVINGS-BANK.—The inhabitants of this borough have been under considerable excitement during the past week, in consequence of a serious defalcation in the accounts of Mr. Sunerwaite, the actuary and secretary, whose name and office are well known to every inhabitant in St. Nicholas-street, and bore a high character in the town, carrying on a good business, and having well-stored vaults. The first intimation of there being anything wrong was conveyed in a letter addressed from Mr. Sunerwaite to the managers; the result was that he was apprehended, and having been charged before the Mayor and borough magistrates with having embezzled money belonging to the depositors, between the years 1845 and 1850, to the amount of £1000, was remanded, in order that an investigation might be made into the affairs of the bank. It is thought the prisoner's defalcations will exceed the sum of £2000. The business of the bank is ordered by the directors to be suspended until the 22nd inst. It is expected that a work of extent will be issued, under which Mr. Sunerwaite's stock in trade, book debts, and effects will be made available to meet his defalcations, in preference to his trade creditors, to whom he owes some large sums.

EXTRAORDINARY RECOVERY OF LOST MONEY.—Last week, a gentleman resident in the neighbourhood of Haddington, Scotland, visited that town for the annual collection of his accounts. Having received about £500, he entered a shop there, and, upon examining his money, he missed the sum of £100. He immediately retraced his steps, and chanced to encounter a group of children in the street, engaged in the examination of what seemed to be pictures, but which, upon a more narrow inspection, he found to be his missing notes, each of £20 value. They were of course recovered from the children, who received in return a small gratuity.

A Freehold Land Society for the county of Hants was commenced at a public meeting at Southampton on Tuesday last. After several speeches had been delivered in explanation of the nature and value of such institutions, a large number of persons called their names as members, making with those previously entered, upwards of 100 shares now subscribed for.

ROBBERIES AT LEEDS, AND DISCOVERY OF THE STOLEN PROPERTY IN LONDON. On Thursday, John Akroyd, William Brodie, Joseph Kitchen, Charles Perfect, Matthew Sellers, and Benjamin Wooller, were brought up at the Leeds Court-house, before C. G. Macleay, Esq., and Thomas Hebdon, Esq., under the following circumstances. Mr. Read, chief constable, stated to the bench, that latterly several robberies had taken place in Leeds and the neighbourhood, the produce of which had been sent out of town without he police being able to trace out the same. A few days ago he received information of a parcel being left at the railway station by the prisoner Sellers, who gave instructions for it to be sent to London by the night mail. He immediately sent Inspector Child to make enquiries, and that officer ascertained that the parcel contained silver plate and other articles which had been stolen from the house of Mr. William Wood, a gentleman residing at Potternewton, near Leeds. The prisoner Kitchen, he should be able to show, had been in correspondence with parties in London, to whom the parcel had been directed. He had also evidence to show that several of the prisoners had been seen together near Mr. Wood's house on the night of the robbery, but he was not then prepared to go fully into the case. After Inspector Child had found that the parcel had been left at the railway station by the prisoner Sellers, that officer was despatched to London, where he arrived by an earlier train than the mail, and he (Mr. Read) had since received from him a letter, dated London, Jan. 12. In this letter he stated that he had proceeded to apprehending a man named Thomas Kay, a notorious character, formerly residing in Leeds, and a man named W. Green. It appeared that the parcel sent by the mail was delivered about 11 o'clock to the prisoner Kay, the parcel being addressed to "Mr. Thomas Wright, No. 10, Pleasant-place, West-square, Lambeth;" and, on receiving the parcel, Kay signed his name to the railway delivery book "Thomas Wright." Inspector Child, who was accompanied by Sergeant Goff, of the London police, were present when the parcel was delivered, and at once took Kay into custody, whilst the parcel was still in his possession. On searching Kay's house, £15s in notes and gold, a gold watch, and other valuable property were found. After this they went to a lumber shop, and other valuable property was found. After this they went to a lumber shop, and apprehended Green, at whose house they found two pieces of cloth, one invisible green and the other black, which would probably turn out to have been stolen from some of the warehouses in Leeds. The prisoners had also other stolen from some of the warehouses in Leeds. The prisoners had also other property in their possession. Mr. Norton, of the Lambeth police-office, who, on hearing the facts stated, had remanded the prisoners for further inquiry. This being so, he (Mr. Read) asked the justices to remand the prisoners for a week. The prisoner Peter, Ashtrayly, The prisoners were then remanded to that day. The prisoner Peter, who is in bad health, was allowed to go at large, on finding bail for his appearance. Kitchen is the son of a respectable innkeeper, in Marsh-lane, Leeds; but the other prisoners are all known to the police.

EXTENSIVE MANUFACTURE OF BASE COIN.—There would seem, from the following circumstances, to be at present one or more mints of base coin at work upon an extensive scale in the metropolis. Up to three times, within the last few weeks, the Manchester police have received notice from the metropolis to be on the alert, as parcels of base half-crowns and five-shilling pieces were being despatched to various parts of Manchester. On each occasion the chief superintendent of police, ten two detective officers to watch the London-road railway station. A brown parcel, evidently of coin, arrived from London by the last train of the night, at the station. The direction, "John Thompson, at Mrs. Herring's, Fountain-quarry, Lower-street," was copied, and Mr. Beswick, with Messrs. Buckley, Gee, and Porter, went to the hotel early in the morning. In an upper room they found a man in bed, who gave his name as W. Brown. In a room adjoining they found a persons sitting at the fire, who called themselves John and Louisa Thompson. In the lap of the woman was a bundle of base half-crowns, and a large quantity more wrapped up in parcels of eight each lying on the bed. On the arrival of the parcel (which had just been left by a messenger from the railway) was also found. They were taken into custody. Altogether, the amount of base money found was £14 10s., which Thompson assured Mr. Beswick was the entire quantity they were in possession of. The coin is the most clever executed, and it is difficult to see the diff-rence between it and the well-worn good half-crown. They are dated George III., 1817; George III. 1819, and George IV. 1823. The principal operations in their composition are all completed, and they are finished off by electro-plating. Their "ring" is identical with the genuine silver, which makes it all the more necessary for the public to be on their guard. The parcel from London had just been received (a few hours before from the railway) was also found. They were taken into custody. DARING HIGHWAY ROBBERIES AT BIRMINGHAM.—On Sunday evening, about half-past five o'clock, Mr. Scott, brother of Mr. Scott, accountant, on his return from business to his father's residence in the Moseley-road, was, near the house of Mr. Colmore, Highgate (scarcely a mile from the Birmingham Maraden Arms), by four men, one of whom he knocked down, and then, while the others held him on the ground, and rifled his pockets of a gold watch and chain, and a purse containing a small sum of money. Mr. Scott, passing the bridges, about 100 yards nearer Birmingham, observed a cab and horse standing in the road. They followed him; and, on arriving nearly opposite the Highgate fields, one of the party exclaimed, "Now's the time," and Mr. Scott was immediately prostrated on the ground. Two persons then give an alarm, when one of the fellows called upon his companions to "throttle him" This they did so far as to stifle his outcry, and having succeeded in their object the three escaped. The perpetrators have lately been committed with impunity in other outskirts of the town. Last week, Mr. Anster, a respectable manufacturer of Birmingham, residing in Camperter-road, Eaglehouse, was attacked in a similar manner, and his watch stopped by a man. The latter way answering the description of a ruffian who is supposed to have committed several depredations of aim tar atrocity which have occurred within the last few weeks. The man put a pistol to his breast, and, having obtained a few shillings by his menacing conduct, succeeded in making his escape.

A reward of two hundred guineas, with her Majesty's free pardon to an accomplice, has been offered for such information as will lead to the discovery of the murderers of either of the three men whose recent sudden disappearance has excited such intense interest in Lynn. The third man, a stranger, about twenty years of age, dressed in a fustian frock, went by the name of William Pybus-house, Purfleet-bridge, on Christmas afternoon, and asked for a lodging. In the course of the evening he went into the street with his slippers on, and has not since been heard of

Dr. Plomley, of Maidstone, has obtained that extraordinary and rare bird the great bustard, which was shot at Lydd, in Romney-marsh, during the last week. It is the only instance of this bird being killed in Kent, and probably, from its scarcity and its indigenous species, it is the last specimen that will be met with in England.

The office of Messrs. Bagshaw and Sons, solicitors, Manchester, was entered last week, during the night, and upwards of £60 in gold and notes stolen from the safe. Suspicion having attached itself to a discharged copying clerk, named Hughes, he was apprehended, and £40 in gold found in his possession. The rest of the money was recovered concealed in a ditch in the Stretford-road, where Hughes confessed to have hidden it. He has been committed.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH —FRIDAY.

THE REV. ROBERT WHISTON v. THE DEAN AND CHAPTER OF ROCHESTER.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOP OF CLIFTON.—Sir F. Thesiger.—I am instructed to appear to show cause against a rule obtained by my learned friend Sir Frederick Pollock, on the part of the Rev Robert Whiston, for a mandamus directed to the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral of Rochester, commanding them to restore to the office of head master of the grammar-school attached to the cathedral of Rochester. The Dean and Chapter are advised that they have a complete answer to the case on the merits, but, looking to the affidavits, it is possible, if they can raise a question on the point, the court which your Lordships would no doubt be reluctant to decide finally upon a rule nisi. The Dean and Chapter, therefore, think it would be more respectful to the court that they should not resist the rule, but that they should not lead to a final result. They, therefore, will consent to the rule being made absolute now, and we will take the argument upon the bringing up of the return. Sir F. Thesiger.—I understand, counsel has been engaged on the part of the Chapter to remove Mr. Whiston from the school and from his house, and I suppose that until the questions at issue are raised the Dean and Chapter will not prosecute that object. Sir F. Kelly: I have no instructions on the point, and cannot give any pledge with regard to it, or even any answer —Sir F. Thesiger: Then I must make a distinct motion for that purpose. I think it rather unreasonable that the Chapter will not accede to such a request, pending the motion. Sir F. Kelly: I think it would be better if my learned friend would communicate with the Dean and Chapter on the subject, and if they refuse an application to stay proceedings in the ejectment, no doubt they will be prepared to grant refusal, if forms, proceedings are taken in this part of the question.—Sir F. Thesiger: Notice has been given to the parents of the boys to place them under the charge of another master, Mr. Steer, and to send them to another school-house; surely it cannot be an obstacle to that course, that it would be better to allow the boys to return to Mr. Whiston's care, on their return to school in the beginning of February, until the whole question is decided.—Sir F. Kelly: The Dean and Chapter, at this time, have no power to remove the boys. I have consider an imperative sense of duty; and I repeat, that, if the course taken by the Dean and Chapter is to be made the subject either of necessitation or of application to the Court, it would be better not to raise a discussion now, which I am not prepared to meet, but to communicate with the Dean and Chapter. Sir F. Thesiger: I must suppose as to my learned friend, but I really supposed that the Dean and Chapter, in resisting him as their counsel, had given him full powers to deal with the case in all its bearings. Sir F. Kelly: Not to accede to a question like this, without notice.—Mr. Justice Patteson: We cannot interfere in any arrangement we may so make between counsel. All we can say is, that rule will be absolute.—Rule absolute.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

RAILWAY AUDIT.

A meeting of the directors of the various railway companies was held on Wednesday at the King's Arms Hotel, Palace yard, to consider what further steps should be taken relative to the subject of railway audit. The meeting was very thinly attended, not more than fourteen or fifteen directors being present.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Lonsdale, chairman of the Whitehaven and Furness Railway Company, occupied the chair.

Mr Swift (the Solicitor of the London and North-Western Railway Company) read the following report:—

The secretary having laid on the table the draft of a bill prepared by him in accordance with the views of the resolutions adopted at the last meeting—Resolved, that although we entertain a strong conviction that amongst railway proprietors generally assent to the principle of any Government audit, yet, as there has not been found to be the needful unity of opinion even amongst boards of directors as to the propriety of the bill, or the propriety of the resolutions formerly adopted, it is not expedient to introduce the bill into Parliament. That it no longer appears to be the duty of, or to be becoming in directors to take any prominent part upon the question of audit, since it would seem to be now viewed, through most newspapers, by a portion of the shareholders in some of the companies, rather as a question between the boards and their constituents than between the body of shareholders and the Government. That it therefore be left to the shareholders themselves to take hereafter such course with regard to the question as they think fit, such board communicating to its constituents this resolution previous to the ensuing general meetings, in such way as may be deemed right.

The resolution having been proposed by the noble Earl in the chair,

Mr. C. G. Glyn, M.P., chairman of the London and North-Western Railway Company, had great pleasure in seconding it, and, after some observations in approval from Mr Denison, Mr. Laing, Mr. Ellis, and Mr. Russell, the resolution was carried unanimously.

MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE.—At a meeting of the shareholders at Gainsborough, just held, it was resolved that the disastrous position of this company imperatively required a thorough, unreserved investigation into the finances, affairs, and past policy of the company, the unexpected determination of the directors to apply for an act of Parliament in the ensuing session to enable them to create new preference stock to the amount of £500,000 was inexpedient, and that it appeared to be prejudicial that the proposed inquiry had been instituted. It was stated there were defaulters in the company to the extent of £40,000.

LEAMINGTON AND RUGBY RAILWAY.—At a public meeting of the inhabitants, held at the Town-hall, Leamington, on Thursday week, Mr. Russell in the chair, it was resolved to adopt a memorial to the directors of the London and North-Western Railway Company, stating that the immediate completion of the line opening out the line to Rugby will be of greater advantage than further delay in completing it; and they respectfully submit that its speedy completion is of vital importance to Warwick, Leamington, and neighbouring towns. Resolutions were passed requesting the Town Commissioners to wait upon the directors with the memorial, and soliciting the members for South Warwickshire and the borough of Warwick to support the same.

SWANSEA AND HEREFORD RAILWAY.—The directors have appointed Mr. H. Roberson engineer to the company, in the place of Messrs. Stephenson and Baker, resigned.

YORK AND NORTH MIDLAND RAILWAY.—Proceedings, it is said, have been commenced against the co-directors, to recover back the premiums on the 100 shares certain of them took the liberty of appropriating to themselves.

LONDON AND SOUTHEND.—A petition has been presented to the Court of Chancery for the winding up of the company's affairs.

THE BRITANNIA BRIDGE.—We learn from Menai that there is at length a complete roadway over the Straits, the second grea. tube having been safely raised to its 100 feet elevation, and forming by its junction with the other tubes a continuous rigid wrought-iron highway 1545 feet long, and between 5000 and 6000 tons in weight. The workmen are now engaged day and night in completing the junctions and adjustments. The greater portion of the permanent way and rails for the main line is laid. The grand apparatus to the bridge at either end, where the colossal lions rest, are finished, including the continuation of the line of rail to the stations on each side at Bangor and Llanfair; and every exertion is being made to have the line complete by the end of February, for it in first trial trains to go through.

RAILWAY ROUND PARIS.—A plan for a line of railway round Paris, in order to unite all the term ni of the great lines, has frequently been mooted, and is now once again brought forward. The circuit, however, is considerably extended; after the vote of 1842, have been continued by M Baude, engineer-in-chief of the ponts et chaussées, and are just completed. The line will embrace the northern suburbs of Paris, from the terminus of the Northern line to that of the Rouen. The terminus of the Western Railway will be connected with that of the Rouen line by a branch, which will unite the two Versailles lines at Viroflay, but the surveys for this part of the work are not yet completed. Those parts which are surveyed will extend about 13 miles. The expense is estimated at about 8,000,000f., but for the execution of the first section alone, that from the Rouen to the Northern and Strasburg Railway, being the only one that could be undertaken immediately, the amount required will not exceed 2,000,000f., and from this sum must be deducted the amount which the respective companies will have to contribute. It is calculated that when the whole line is completed the annual receipts will amount to 460 000f., or 4½ per cent. on the outlay of 8,000,000f.. and that a saving of 800,000f. annually will accrue to the commercial community of Paris and the neighbourhood, in addition to the increased value which will be given to property near the line, from the probable erection of manufacturing establishments.

The Leeds town council met on Monday to consider the propriety of appointing an inspector of the smoke nuisance, with a view to its abatement. There was much difference of opinion on the subject, many of the members contending that the greatest portion of the smoke made its appearance from the low chimneys of dyehouses, brick-kilns, &c., over which they had no control by the local act. The motion, on being put from the chair, was lost, 18 voting for, and 19 against it.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

A depression of ⅛ per cent. marked the opening of Consols on Monday, which would have doubtless been greater, from the intelligence of a loss for Russia Company, had not the latter news been counteracted by the fact of friendly relations being re-established between that Government and the Sublime Porte. Prices during the day, therefore, slightly rallied, and the closing quotation became 96¾. Tuesday was principally occupied in preparations for the settlement of the Account. The parties for the rise, not finding money so readily to carry their accounts, were in some instances obliged to sell, and a depression of prices resulted, Consols closing at 96⅞. Extensive fluctuations in connection with the settlement of the Account occurred on Wednesday, Consols opening at 96¾ to ⅞ shortly receding to 96, in consequence of the large amount of stock thrown over. As the day advanced, however, prices improved, and 96⅝ was again registered, afterwards decreasing to 96⅜ sellers. On Thursday the market was again weak, money stock proving plentiful, and the Account remaining still partially unadjusted. Consols opened to 96, but before the close of the week the current prices were, for—Bank Stock, 207½; Reduced, 96⅜; Consols, 96⅜; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 98⅛; Long Annuities, expiring January 5th, 1860, 8 7-16; Ditto, ditto, January 5th, 1885, 8 3-16; India Bonds, sm. £1000, 95 p; South Sea Stock, 93½; Ditto, Old Annuities, 96½; Consols for Account, 96⅝; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 61 p; £500, ditto, 61 p; Small ditto, 61 p.

A Russian loan for £5,000,000 was announced on Monday, by Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. The subscription price is 93, at 4½ per cent. interest, and the instalments are fixed for the 15th of February, March, April, May, and June, the first £50 being paid on application immediately after allotment, and the remaining half a year's dividend from January to July) on the 15th of July. After deducting discount on the instalments at 3 per cent., and £7 profit on repayment, the net yield nearly £5 per cent., interest at the enhanced price.

A correspondence between the chairman of the South American bondholders and Messrs. Schneider and Co., shows that £10,367 13s. 7d. is required to pay the remaining part of the fourth dividend on the American debt due the 1st of January, 1847.

The week commenced without much activity in the Foreign market, but on Tuesday more animation occurred. Brazilian improved ½ per cent, in consequence of the increase of the debt by the new loan; but, as there can exist little doubt that the money will have to be repaid by Annuity, to whom it has been long since advanced, the resources of the latter will be taxed to the utmost. The large increase has been done in Portuguese, and Spanish were fractionally improved. Mexican have not materially altered. Russian receded on Thursday to 107 108; and Portuguese were flatter, it being understood that the revenue had been overstated. Closing prices were—Brazilian Bonds, five per Cent., 89¾; Buenos Ayres Bonds, Six per Cent., 90; Mexican Bonds, 46¾, Five per Cent., Ex Jan. Coupons, 99¾; Ditto Account, 99¾; Peruvian Bonds, Five per Cent., 99¾; Ditto Deferred, 83¾; Portuguese Bonds, Five per Cent., 35¾; Ditto for the Account, 36; Russian Bonds, 4½, Five per Cent., 108; Spanish Bonds, Five per Cent., 1840, Account, 19¾; Spanish Bonds, Three per Cent. Account, 37; Belgian Four-and-a-Half per Cent., 90¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 12 Guild., 56¾.

The share Market has shown a marked improvement, particularly Brighton and South-Western, North-Western, &c. Although towards the close of the week a reaction occurred, yet the balance of transactions is largely in favour of improved prices. The market at the close of business was, however, very inactive, as the following list of bargains will evidence: Great Northern, 74¾; Great Western, 66¾; Hull and Selby, 101; London and North-Western, 115¾; Midland, and South-Western, 67; Ditto, New Six, 1865, Preference, 7 per Cent., 7½; Midland, Birmingham, and Derby, 28½; North Staffordshire, 7¾; South-Eastern, 30; Ditto, Six, 4, 68; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, 16½; ditto, and Newcastle Extension, 14; York and North Midland, 18½; ditto, Preference, 6 p.c.; Hodigone and Amiens, 7¾; Central of France (Orleans and Vierzon), 13 x.d.; Northern of France, 12 x.d.

The transactions in the Consol Market on Friday were trifling, at about the decline noticed on Thursday. The firms per Cents—money—were marked 96¾ to ⅞, and for the account, 96⅞ to ⅞, showing a very wide margin for next time. This is almost wholly owing to the increased rates demanded by the Bank in making advances upon stock. The Dutch Debt was steady, but Foreign Bonds and Railway Shares commanded very little attention.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday). Since Monday last the arrivals of English wheat for our market, coastwise, have not exceeded 1310 quarters. By railway the receipts have been somewhat extensive, and Monday's sound samples were on offer, owing to which, the thin attendance of millers, and the continued pressure of foreign flour for sale, the demand for all kinds of wheat, of some produce was heavy in the extreme, and, in some instances, the quotations were a shade lower, without effecting a clearance. Rather under 2000 quarters of foreign wheat have come in this week. The trade with the Irish markets, however, was greatly depressed, and the out-of-condition sorts were sower to purchase. Barley, the show of which was good, ruled dull, at barely the late decline in value. The quantity of malt ready for delivery was trifling, yet the sale for that article was in a very inactive state, at last week's quotations. Good kinds of beans, peas, and tares, were firm. The middling sorts, and quite as dear. Flour ruled very dull. Beans, peas, indian corn, and flour were heavy.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 1410 quarters; barley, 1060; malt, 1250; oats, 360; flour, 2650. Irish: wheat, ——; barley, ——; oats, ——. Foreign: wheat, 1060; barley, 7570; oats, 8360. Flour: ——quarts.

English—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 38s to 42s. ditto, white, 41s to 49s: Norfolk and Suffolk, red, ——; ditto, white, 43s to 46s; rye, 32s to 33s; grinding barley, 19s to 23s; distilling ditto, 24s to 26s; malting ditto, 28s to 32s: Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 52s to 56s; brown ditto, ——: Kingston and Ware, 54s to 57s; Chevalier, 57s to 58s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire oats, ——s to ——s, potato ditto, 17s to 20s; Youghal and Cork, black, 15s to 16s; ditto, white, 14s to 15s; Inch beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 38s to 39s, grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 36s to 38s, white, 32s to 37s; boilers, 37s to 39s per quarter. Town-made flour, 35s to 40s; Suffolk, 30s to 33s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 30s to 33s per 280 lb.

Foreign—Wheat, ——s to ——s; barley, ——s to ——s; oats, ——s to ——s; rye, 33s to 34s; beans, 36s to 37s; peas, 36s to 37s; maple, 37s to 38s per quarter; flour, 21s to 24s per barrel; Baltic, 24s to 28s per barrel.

Seeds—Linseed. The demand for all seeds is heavy, at almost nominal prices. Cakes are again lower.

English—Linseed, sowing, 54s to 56s; Baltic, crushing, 40s to 42s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 41s to 43s; hempseed, 35s to 36s per quarter; coriander, 15s to 23s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 8s to 11s; white ditto, 5s to 8s; tares, 32s to 34s per bushel. English rapeseed, new, 36l to 38l; ditto, old, ——l to ——l; Essex and Kent, 36l to 38l; Hollland, 35l to 37l. Baltic, foreign, 35l to 36l; Cole, 32l per last of 10 quarters; linseed cakes, English, 5l to 5l 5s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 4l to 4l 5s per ton; coarse, 75s to 80s per quarter. English clover seed, red, ——s to ——s; white, ——s to ——s; extra, up to ——s. Foreign, red, ——s to ——s; extra, ——s to ——s; white, ——s to ——s; extra, ——s.

Imported into London last week: wheat, 6610 quarters; barley, 2180; oats, 15s 6d; rye, 23s 4d; beans, 26s 6d; peas, 26s 6d.

The Corn Trade (Liverpool)—Wheat 32s 6d; barley, 26s 6d; oats, 15s 10d; rye, 23s 6d; beans, 27s 6d; peas, 29s 6d.

Potatoes and Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 1s 6d; barley, 1s 0d; oats, 1s 0d; rye, 1s 0d; beans, 1s 0d; peas, 1s 0d

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are fr m 6d to 7d of household ditto, 5d to 6d per 4lb loaf.

Tea.—A small public sale took place on Wednesday, at which the biddings were steady, at very full prices. Common sound congou is in request, at 9½d to 10d per lb The value of all other kinds of tea is well supported.

Sugar.—In the refined market we have sold to a fair extent, in some ins ances, an advance in the quotations of 6d per cwt. The value of all other kinds of raw sugar has been well sustained. Refined goods steady. Brown lumps, 42s to 50s; good ordinary ditto, 39s to 40s per cwt.

Coffee.—Ceylon coffee has sold briskly this week, at 66s per cwt for good ordinary native. The public sales have exceeded 40,000 lbs. Most other kinds are in steady request, and quite as dear.

Provisions.—Owing to the severity of the weather, the demand for the best qualities of foreign butter has ruled tolerably steady this week, at full prices. In all other kinds there has been little business has been transacted, at lowering rates. Fine Friesland and Kiel is selling at 84s to 90s; fine Holland, 68s to 72s. and fine 76s to 80s per cwt. Carlow bacon is in steady request, at about former quotations. Waterford, very sandod, 72s to 80s; Clonmel and Kilkenny, 70s to 76s; Cork, 70s to 72s; Limerick, 68s to 69s. Waterford, 66s to 68s; Sligo, 62s to 64s; and Dublin, 64s to 66s per cwt. Fine hog-meat, Waterford, steady, at late figures. Most other kinds move off slowly. Fine Dorset, barely is tolerably steady, at late prices. Hams are firm, 8s to 10s per dozen lbs. On the 9th, inferior and middling, 60s to 80s per cwt; fresh, 8s to 9s per dozen lbs. On the whole, the bacon market is firm, but we have seen no improvement to notice in the article. Small Waterford, landed, 44s to 47s, heavy, 42s to 44s; Clonmel, small, 43s to 44s; and heavy, 41s to 42s; Limerick, small, 42s to 43s; and heavy, 40s to 41s per cwt.

Oils.—Most descriptions, except linseed, which is somewhat lower in value, move off steadily at full rates of currency.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 10s to £3 12s: clover ditto, £3 10s to £4 12s; and straw, £1 2s to £1 8s per load.

Spirits.—Although several additions have been made to the stock of brandy, a good business is done in this article, at full prices. In rum a retail per gallon higher. Genevas and corn spirits dull.

Coals (Friday).—Hetherwell Main, 18s 6d; Stewart's, 18s; Tanfield Moor, 18s; Wylam, 17s, Hilda, 19s; Caradoc, 19s 6d; St. Hilda's, 18s 6d; Kenton, ——s; Hetton, ——s; Lambton, ——s; Hartley, ——s; Tyne Primrose, ——s; Wallsend PHRENOLOGY in RELATION to the NOVEL, the CRITICISM, and the DRAMA. "The point in question is duly urged, and many instances are given of the fallacies of modern critiism, and of the benefits derivable from a knowledge of the mental organs as developed by Phrenology. This little volume opens a new and interesting field of speculation."—Bath Herald. "A deep thinker. Berwick Warder. "The tragic drama is dissected, like the bull-fights of Spain, or the gladiatorial combats of old Rome, to fall before the advancing spirit of civilisation."—Blackwood's Magazine. "I have read it with much pleasure; indeed, I am greatly interested to see the appearance of a profound thinker and elegant writer ranging himself on the side of Phrenology."—Mr. George Combe, in a Letter to the Author.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FREEDOM.

French Liberty is an abstraction, an idea, a fancy, for which a brave, a generous, a witty, and an intelligent people have made sacrifices unparalleled in the history of the world. But no Frenchman, from Louis XVI. down to Louis Napoleon, and from Robespierre and Marat down to Proudhon and Leroux, though perfectly able to comprehend the illimitable nature of the liberty he required for himself, has ever been able to render that liberty compatible with the liberty of other people. French liberty, or the thing that goes by that name, has no toleration, and real liberty becomes in consequence impossible.

Last week the tailors of London met, to the number of three or four thousand, in Exeter Hall, and peaceably detailed their wrongs and grievances one to the other, and peaceably agreed upon a formal resolution expressive of what in their estimation would remedy them. During the previous week, the cooks and marmitons of Paris announced a public meeting for a similar purpose. No sooner did their intention reach the ears of the Government, than the police were despatched to prevent the meeting as dangerous to the public peace. Possibly the French Government was right in the exercise of what we in this country should call a most unwarrantable stroke of arbitrary power, and did no more than its duty in preventing those warlike and intolerant cooks from running a tilt against society, with spits for spears and dish-covers for helmets. The truth is that Frenchmen cannot safely be trusted with the right of public meeting. The indignant denunciations of the English platform, which answer their purpose of raising a round of applause, or of exciting a pleasant, and n no wise unsafe, degree of irritation in the sluggish bosom of John Bull, fall upon combustible materials when scattered among a crowd of Frenchmen. A great French author remarked, before the revolution of February, 1848, in reference to the January Reform banquets of M. Odillon Barrot and his co-agitators, that the French were not to be trusted in public, and that they could not understand the being called together merely to listen to speeches. They always imagined that something was to be done, —and that the indignation of words and phrases was but the natural and legitimate prelude to the indignation of the fist and the bullet. English peace meetings are somewhat warlike in tone; but a peace meeting composed entirely of Frenchmen would in all probability become warlike in fact. The French Government knows the combustible temperament of his Majesty the people, and will not allow him to excite himself. The Government is prudent: but, nevertheless, it must be humiliating to the French to reflect that their long and sanguinary struggles have been in vain; and that though in theory they enjoy ten times the liberty of the more phlegmatic English, they do not in fact enjoy the tithe of it. Even an election by universal suffrage is not free. The latest accounts from Paris inform us that the framers of the Constitution unaccountably forgot to fix any limits within which new elections must take place when vacancies occur in the Legislative Assembly; and that the Government, dreading the success of Socialist candidates in several departments at present unrepresented, was for a long time undecided whether all these elections should not be postponed sine die. This was considered, after due reflection, to be rather too despotic for a free Republic; and the elections will take place—in a month or two! The Government has resolved, however, that the Socialists shall be muzzled, and prevented from throwing lighted matches into the "villanous saltpetre" of the rural intellect in the departments. When the law restricting the sale of newspapers was passed last year, a clause was inserted, to the effect that for forty-five days before the general elections, the sale of papers, addresses, and circulars, of whatever kind, should be free. The Government contend that this law does not apply to special elections, and have given orders that the addresses of any candidate opposed to the Government shall not be distributed without special permission from the prefects. Much as John Bull hates revolutions, and quiet as he usually is, it is much to be doubted whether he would patiently endure such an outrage upon his liberty. A contested election is the Englishman's saturnalia, when he may use abusive language, get drunk, smash windows, and make a fool of himself, with perfect impunity. But an election row in France, instead of being a harmless local hubbub, would be a signal for insurrection; so, until they understand liberty a little better, their rulers have determined that they shall enjoy as little of it as possible.

There is the same want of toleration even in the Hall of the Legislature. There is, strictly speaking, no freedom of debate; and the unhappy president of the Assembly is powerless, either to preserve order or to enforce respect for his own office and the right of free discussion. In England, the House of Commons is sometimes free enough, in the least favourable sense of the term. It is a part of a member's privilege to sit with his hat on—to lie full-length in the gallery benches, and fall asleep; nay, it is part of his right even to snore—a right which he sometimes exercises. In the heat of debate, he may express dissent from his opponent in a somewhat peculiar fashion: he may stamp with his feet, or imitate the crowing of a cock or the braying of a donkey; but he never forgets the respect that is due to the dignified chairman, whom he has himself been instrumental in electing, or whom perhaps he opposed; and should he overstep for a moment the decency of debate, a word recalls him to a sense of his error—he tacitly confesses that he himself is a gentleman, by acknowledging that he is in a society of gentlemen and obeying the unwritten laws of courtesy and good breeding. How different is the case in the French Assembly. The turbulent character of the mob outside finds its representatives within; and sometimes with a good feeling, and sometimes with an evil one, scenes are enacted which are utterly incompatible with the dignity of a Senate, or the ordinary usages of gentlemen in other countries. Not long ago, the brother of the president—not of the Republic, but of the Assembly—made a very able speech. The president was much pleased and much affected, and, leaving the chair, descended to the tribune, and gave the orator a fraternal hug in token of his approval. We have but to fancy Mr. Shaw Lefevre in such a position, to see at a glance the calm and judicial character of the English mind, compared with that of the French. The president is completely at the mercy of the Assembly, and sits in his chair by sufferance. If order be disturbed, he has authority to ring a little bell; if the warning be disregarded, as it almost invariably is, he can ring again till his wrist aches with the exertion. Should it be still disregarded, he can put his hat on. Beyond that he has no power. The consequence is that the members say what they please, and have no more awe of, or respect for, the president than they have for each other.

It is not easy to change the character of a people, or to cool the brains of those who are constitutionally heated; but, supposing the French fortunate enough to discover and to elect a judicious, cool, urbane, impartial president for the first Assembly in the land, it would be worth their while to invest him, for the sake of real freedom, with the powers of repression when real liberty was invaded. To be ordered into the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms in the English House of Commons, although the detention be merely nominal, and do not last five minutes, is an infliction which no member likes to incur. It costs from twenty to thirty pounds, in fees, to be released. Might not the French with great advantage arm M. Dupin with the same powers? To be mulcted of a month's salary for a breach of order would cool the blood of the hottest Mountaineer; and members would speedily cease to cast the words "liars" and "brigands" at one another. Liberty, deprived of this license of the tongue, would be more real; and the government, the Assembly, and the people would severally be the winners by the higher tone of public sentiment that would be the necessary result of a change so desirable.

PROTECTION MOVEMENT IN IRELAND.

THE great demonstration of Peers, commoners, landowners, &c., which had been announced for some time previously, took place in Dublin, on Thursday week, and was noticed briefly in our Postscript of last Saturday. We now subjoin a somewhat fuller account of the proceedings, and accompanying the report with an Engraving illustrative of this expression of the national will, as at least its promoters designated it to be.

The meeting was held in one of the capacious saloons of the Rotundo, in Sackville-street, and commenced shortly before noon, by the Marquis of Downshire being voted to the chair. Among those assembled on the platform were, the Marquis of Waterford, the Earl of Shannon: the Earl of Glengall: the Earl of Bandon: the Earl of Mayo: Lord Farnham: Lord Clements: Lord Castlecoote: Colonel Dunne, M.P.: Colonel Chatterton, M.P.: Mr. J. H. Hamilton, M.P., Mr. O. A. Hamilton, M.P.: Mr. E. George, M.P.: Colonel Taylor, M.P.: Sir Edward Grogan: Sir George Hodson, &c.

The Earl of Glengall, who was one of the chief promoters of the movement, proposed the first resolution. He said, "My Lords and gentlemen, the resolution which I have the honour to propose to you is one which I feel quite sincerely is one which I feel quite confident must meet with its ready approbation. It is a resolution expressive of the regard and affection entertained by our most gracious Sovereign for all classes of her Irish subjects, and its terms are as follow:—

"That we feel ourselves persuaded of the great regard and affection entertained by our most gracious Sovereign for all classes of her Irish subjects; and that, so entering in her Royal sympathies and good-will, we consider that under the deplorable circumstances in which Ireland is placed, we best discharge our duty to our Sovereign, as well as to our country, in representing, without delay, to her humble petition, the unprecedented misery and distress to which this once prosperous island has been reduced.

After some preliminary observations, the noble Earl said:—"Every man possessed of a rational mind must know that the present state of things in Ireland could not continue much longer without all classes of the community being dragged down together into the common vortex of ruin. (Cheers.) But, gentlemen, we are told it is a landlords' question. (Hear, hear.) Most undoubtedly it is; but it is also a tenant-farmers' question. ('Hear,' and cheers.) And it is likewise a merchant's question, a shopkeeper's question, a shipowner's question, a colonial question. (Cheers.) I will tell you, also what it is; it is a mechanic's question; and what is, perhaps, of more importance than all—it is a labourer's question. (Cheers.) It is also essentially an Irish question, and a question of vital interest to every man who has two arms, and who desires to live by honest industry." ('Hear,' and cheers.) We have been told over and again that it is anti-Free-trade cry, and the movement now being made in favour of Protection, is a mere question of landlords and high rents. But why, in truth, are the Irish landlords so pressed? Why is it that they have been made upon them for the last ninety years? I will tell you; it is because they are a class of men who are loyal to the backbone ('Hear, hear,' and loud cheers); it is because they are loyal to the British Crown and to the British Constitution, and have set at defiance the Juggling ('Hear,' and laughter) of Repeal agitators. It is for that because, I ought add, they would not bow to the brazen serpent which the ungodly have set up. (Hear, hear.) That is the reason why the Irish landlords are abused; but let me tell the people of England once and for all the nature of our position, and depend upon it a different policy will soon be adopted towards this country. (Cheers.) We have no manufactures in this country, and every single article of iron, brass, tin, or copper which is used in it is imported to us from England. ('Hear, hear,' and cheers.) Moreover, every article of cloth, earthenware, or china, whether it be used by the nobleman or the peasant, comes over here from the other side of the Channel. (Hear, hear.) Why, we are the best customers the English people have, and the destitution which has come upon Ireland has fallen back upon themselves. (Hear, hear.) We are not at present taking their manufactures, because they have destroyed our agriculture. ('Hear,' and cheers.) Under these circumstances, I would hope that when the English manufacturers take into their consideration the loss of their Irish market, they will perceive that the Irish bird in the hand is worth two of the foreign birds in the bush. ('Hear, hear,' and loud cheers.) There is a word which used to be employed very much whenever the Free-Trade doctrines were inculcated into the minds of the people of England—a word which was used as a kind of talisman at their meetings, and which led many to suppose that Free-Trade was the foundation-stone of universal prosperity. (Hear, hear.) That word was 'reciprocity.' (Hear, hear.) What has become of that word now? (Loud cheering.) I have lately read a good many of the Free-Trade speeches, but I never once met with one syllable about reciprocity. But, whilst I am on the subject of reciprocity, I may remark that a voice has recently come across the broad waters of the Atlantic, from the free and enlightened citizens of the greatest Republic in the western world. ('Hear, hear,' and cheers.) He who fills the Presidential chair, and represents the opinions of twenty millions of people, tells you that they will take your cattle for their corn, and that they will uphold their present system of protective duties upon native industry. ('Hear, hear,' and cheers.) We do not ask protection in this sense, that we wish for any advantage over the foreigner. All we ask and desire is, to be placed upon an equality with the foreigner. But, gentlemen, before I have done, I have a crow to pluck with England. (Hear.) We have been grossly maligned by a section of some parties in that country. Those parties would insult us, and would wish to make us hear about why it is that Ireland has been of late a mill-stone around the neck of England. (Hear, hear.) Remember how, from the year 1650 down to the year 1782, a period of 130 years, the British Parliament acted towards this country. (Hear, hear.) It cannot be forgotten that they prohibited every species of Irish produce and of Irish manufacture from entering England, to the ruin and destruction both of our agriculture and our manufactures; of the latter they made very short work. (Hear, hear.) They even denied us the power of trading with the colonies, and treated us, in fact, as a conquered country. (Hear, hear.) Is it, then, a matter of surprise that Ireland is not as prosperous as England? Indeed, the thing does appear to me as that we have so far weathered the storm. True it was that, in 1782 the voice of Ireland was too strong for our oppressors, and then we obtained something like justice, and were dealt with as fellow-mortals, and fellow-Christians. I do not think we shall allow this state of things to exist many months longer; if we do, I can only say, it must be our own fault. (Hear, hear.) The people of Ireland are determined to speak out. The real and true way for the people of Ireland to remedy their grievances was this—let them reform their representatives. (Loud cries of 'Hear, hear.') It was all useless going on in the way they were—they must be properly represented; and the way to do this was, when they left that assembly and went home to their country residence, let them form societies which would have for object the inspection of the registery-books. (Hear, hear.) Let them get every man who was qualified to register his vote; let them make all the friends of the cause register in ever county and borough (hear, hear); let them find out who could register, and force them by the most gentlemanly means (laughter) to attend at the quarter sessions, and get them to put their names upon the books. (Hear.) By that means they would return to Parliament a good hundred men from Ireland, and that phalanx of men would compel the Minister ('Hear,' and cheers) to redress the grievances of Ireland. (Hear, hear.) In the present state of parties in England, I would be glad to know how Ministers could withstand 100 Irish members? If," continued the noble Lord, "they (the English) do not redress our grievances, we will redress them ourselves. (Cheers.) We will do as our forefathers did in the famous year of 1782—(cheers) and I would recommend our oppressors to begin a new system of policy towards Ireland at once, for fear it should be too late. (Hear, hear.) 'It is too late,' are ominous words in these times—(hear, hear)—and I tell them it may occur that the people of Ireland may tell them that their concessions came too late. (Hear, hear.) And I tell you, gentlemen, one and all, to remember what our forefathers did in 1782." (Tremendous cheering.)

Mr. George Macartney seconded the resolution, which was agreed to after Messrs. Fitzgibbon and Boylan had spoken in support of it.

The Marquis of Westmeath, after some flattering remarks on Messrs. Fitzgibbon and Boylan, proposed the next resolution:—

"That the interests of all classes in this country are rapidly deteriorating; that within the last four years the annual value of property in Ireland has decreased from fifteen millions; that in many parts of Ireland whole districts of land remain uncultivated, while the best and most fertile tracts are emigrating from day to day, and those who remain are unable, by any amount of energies or exertion, to bear up against the evils by which they are surrounded; and it is the deliberate opinion of this meeting, that unless measures be speedily devised to stay the downward progress of events, Ireland will, at no distant day, be reduced to pauperism and ruin.

His Lordship, after adverting to the equivocal position in which he had been placed, and remarking upon the iniquities of English legislation, proceeded to comment on the Poor-law, observing—"At the close of the last session of Parliament Lord John Russell (hisses)—told the House of Commons that the Poor-law was working well. ('Oh, oh!') when Lord J. Russell made that declaration, was he half asleep? (Hear, hear.) But he was not even able to sleep at his post. Was he inebriate? (Laughter.) He is too much a gentleman to be guilty of that state when about to perform a duty. What, then, is the conclusion we are entitled to come to? Whether he was deceived by those under him, or not, he is utterly unfit to be at the head of the Government—(cheers) and I should be our purpose, if possible, to do our utmost to remove him." (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Butt, Q.C., seconded the resolution; which was supported by Mr. H. Grattan, M.P., who avowed himself an ardent Protectionist, and it was then agreed to.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. Preston, the third resolution was put. It urged that a committee take instant steps to lay the petition before her Majesty.

Resolutions to the following effect were also passed, viz.:—

The Fourth—Declaring all Irish interests to have been sacrificed by the Imperial policy, the only remedy for which was a return to Protection.

The Fifth—Condemnatory of the Irish Poor-law.

The Sixth—Demanding the development of the great resources of Ireland.

The Seventh—Expressive of the deplorable state of the relation between landlord and tenant.

The Eighth—Calling on the Irish Members to support no political parties who would not listen to the just demands for redress. And, finally,

The Ninth—Which urged the propriety, in the event of the prayer of the petitioners being disregarded, of petitioning the Queen to dissolve Parliament.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The discussion on a bill before the French Chamber, for transporting the remaining unpardoned insurgents of June to Algeria, has presented again a series of those stormy scenes which have so often rendered unpleasantly notorious the sittings of that Assembly. On Tuesday the following scene, which led to a duel, was enacted

M. de Testelin, in opposition to the motion of the committee, proposed an amendment, "To have the insurgents sent before the Council of War." In supporting the amendment, M. de Testelin took the opportunity of stating that a member of the cabinet had the day before uttered a threat to the Minister of the Interior against the President of the Republic, declaring "We will pass this bill; but if the President pardons any one of these men, as he has already done, let him look to it!"

M. Ferdinand Barrot, the Minister of the Interior, denied that anything in the shape of a threat had been uttered—he would not have permitted it.

M. de Kerrad said that he was the person who had conversed with the Minister of the interior the day before, and that no such threat was uttered.

M. de Cosilin: Do not reply to such a shameful act of espionage.

A scene of great confusion here ensued; several members attempting to make themselves heard by the Assembly. Loud exclamations proceeded from every side.

M. de Kerdrel said, he must ask permission to speak. He had the day before, when the sitting was suspended, been engaged in conversation with the Minister of the Interior in familiar conversation, and when so, he certainly never once supposed that any representative would act the eavesdropper. (Sensation.) He had made no threat whatever. He had merely expressed his regret that, on a late occasion, the Assembly had been deprived of the credit of voting an amnesty, which a few days after had been granted from another quarter. "I spoke thus," said the hon. representative to the Minister; "and if I did not do it was because I knew that no one was present but representatives. I reckoned on a private conversation being held secred by them—I see now that I was wrong to form any such opinion." (Loud applause, over and over again repeated, with clapping of hands)

M. Testelin ascended the tribune, and was greeted with loud expressions of indignation. (Cries of "eavesdropper," "listener at doors," were heard.) He was no eavesdropper. The thing was not ever.

M. de Cosilin: Was that a reason for falsely reporting the words of M. de Kerdrel?

M. Testelin: You insult a member of the Left. (A voice: "It is you who have placed yourself in that position.") I have just been told that I have not told the truth. (On the Left: "Leave the tribune.")

The hon. gentleman then descended from the tribune, amidst strong marks of disgust from various parts of the Chamber.

In consequence of the alleged insult cast during this scene upon M. de Testelin by M de Cosilin, a duel was determined upon, and friends were immediately selected to conduct the preliminaries, which, it is said, were arranged, the principals and their seconds met in the Bois de Bologne, on Wednesday morning with broadswords. The combat lasted a quarter of an hour, when M. de Cosilin received a wound over the head, which terminated the affair. M. de Testelin escaped without injury.

On Wednesday the discussion was carried on in the same tumultuous way as disgraced the previous day's sitting, and was, indeed, that one member, Ardent Republican, declared that the spectacle offered by the Assembly during the last three days was most fatal to the Republic, and that the insane speeches delivered during the discussion took place in the face of the greatest peril.

In general politics there is nothing calling for notice

It is said that the President of the Republic has received a very flattering letter from the Emperor of Russia—a favour which Louis Philippe was never able to obtain.

After the Revolution of July, 1830, a ukase was issued, forbidding the Russian authorities to grant passports for France. A similar ukase was issued after the revolution of February, 1848; but orders have just been given by the Emperor of Russia to withdraw the ukase. Official notice to this effect has been given to the French Consul.

The Prince de Canino has forwarded to the Legislative Assembly the following petition:—"In my quality of French citizen, I demand to be allowed to enter France like my brothers Pierre Antoine, Louis Lucien Bonaparte; like my uncle Jerome, and his son; and like my first cousin, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte."

According to some of the journals, the affairs of Rome are likely to become more complicated, from the fact that the Court of Vienna insists upon all the French troops being withdrawn from Rome, which the Republican Ministry are not disposed to grant.

PORTUGAL.

Rumours are said Madrid have reached us that Don Miguel was about to march into Portugal, at the head of his partisans, with the object of regaining the throne.

PRUSSIA.

Accounts from Berlin, of the 18th instant, state, that negotiations between Denmark and Prussia, respecting the Duchies, Holstein disputes, were at length seriously about to commence, at the pressing entreaties of the Earl of Westmoreland, the British Ambassador at Berlin. The Plenipotentiaries of each power exchanged the formal preliminaries on the 17th; and each party was expected to set assiduously to work, in order to bring this litigious question to a satisfactory close.

SWITZERLAND.

Some disturbances have broken out at Geneva, in Switzerland, which at one time assumed a very alarming appearance. The following particulars have reached us:—

"The members of the Federal Association and of the clubs resolved to give the Government a day's labour for demolishing the fortifications, and they marched to the work every morning accompanied by music, and singing the 'Marseillaise.' The peaceable people took alarm at these menacing promenades, and the Government called on the musicians to give up their drums and instruments. This the musicians refused, and, on the 17th instant, the gendarmes arrested them as they entered the town at the head of the people. Immediately a mob assembled and commenced an attack on the Town Hall. M. Reynaud and M. Beaumont attempted to harangue the crowd, but they were hooted. M. James Fazy, the idol of the mob, also came forward to speak, but he was not listened to. On retiring, he sent orders for fifty gendarmes to come to the Town-hall. They arrived at five o'clock, fully armed, and with their bayonets fixed. The mob shouted 'Down with the bayonets!' 'To arms!' The gendarmes succeeded in forcing an entrance into the Town-hall, with the exception of three, who were thrown down and disarmed. The mob then commenced beating at the doors of the Town-hall; and, as they did so, they roared the 'Marseillaise.' Their attitude was so threatening, that profound alarm was caused in the city, and the shops were closed. The general crowd was beaten; but at length M. Fazy and the other members of the Government, in the hope of appeasing the mob, released the refractory musicians. This had a good effect; and after a while the mob dispersed, though not before they had made a threatening demonstration beneath the windows of two councillors of state noted for their moderation.

TURKEY.

Later advices than those published last week state that though Russia has resumed diplomatic relations with the Porte, Austria has not. The list of Hungarians whose localisation is demanded by the latter power is thirty-two; but as it is to remain open two months longer, several names will still be added.

The following are the names of the persons whose extradition was demanded by Russia, but to whose removal she has finally consented on demand:—General Dembinski, Severen Korserki, Main Szzinski, Stanislas Hendrseki, Edouard Denarski, Stanslas Hondrseki, Adam Donatcheseki, Jules Zabadinski, Jacques Montanowyle, Stanislas Gregenski, Francois Daeckiewich, General Bem, General Wysocki, and Count Zamoyski. This number has been reduced to twelve, because General Bem has embraced Islamism, and Count Zamoyski has claimed the benefit of his right of a naturalised Frenchman.

ITALIAN STATES.

From the Peninsula we have nothing but rumours. At Rome, people begin almost to despair of the Pope's return. It is said, nevertheless, that his return is at hand, and that he will pass some time at Bologna, by way of feeling the pulse of public opinion, previous to his re-entry into the Eternal City.

RUSSIA.

Some five months ago, a political conspiracy to rid Russia of the Autocrat and his Government was discovered at St. Petersburg, and the investigation connected with it has just terminated. Twenty-one of the leaders have been sentenced to imprisonment for life, with hard labour in the mines and hard labour for life in the mines and on the fortifications, or incorporation in the ranks of the army. They were generally young men of rank and education.

UNITED STATES.

Intelligence to the 8th inst. has been received from New York. The United States Congress had met, and the slavery question debate had already taken place. The question of the Wilmot proviso (the extension or restriction of slavery) was also on the tapis, discussed with its usual heat and violence. A resolution in the House of Representatives had been passed, calling upon them for information respecting British aggression in Central America; and resolutions had been moved in the House of Representatives, to inquire into the expediency of suspending diplomatic intercourse with Austria, in an able and energetic speech, in which he denounced the executions of the Hungarian leaders and other persons connected with the recent insurrection against the Austrian Government as cruelties. In the course of his remarks, General Cass said: "A power thus acting at distance the opinion of the world, and violating the very best feelings of our nature, in the very wantonness of successful cruelty, has no bond of union with the American people. The sooner our diplomatic intercourse is dissolved with marks of indignant reprobation, the sooner shall we perform an act of public duty." Mr. Hale said, that, as the resolution proposed a change in the policy of the Government, he hoped it would not be hastily acted upon.

Nothing definite has been yet done on the subject. Since the matter had been introduced into Congress by General Cass, it had penetrated even the legislatures of the States. In the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, a resolution was offered on the 2nd, calling upon the senators and representatives of the State of Washington to use all honourable means to signify to the Austrian Government the disapprobation of the American people towards the Austrian treatment of the Magyars, as well as to use their exertions to procure the discontinuance of all diplomatic intercourse with that nation until it acknowledges the independence of the Hungarians. Mr. Clay, it is said, is opposed to such a movement, and gives a very sensible reason for opposing it, namely, that the very face of any Government being capable of committing such inhumanities on its subjects renders it impossible for any respectable citizen of the United States Government should have a Minister accredited to it for the protection of American citizens, in the event of any of them being so unfortunate as to get within the sway of the Austrian eagle.

The American mail steamers are, it is said, to resume running from New York to Southampton in February, instead of waiting till the spring, as before announced. The Washington is to sail from New York on the 20th proximo.

CALIFORNIA.

From this El Dorado the accounts are sad. There was some approbation of famine, or, at least, of a great scarcity of provisions. It is possible, however, that such a prospect may be much magnified by speculators; and if so, they had not, up to the sailing of the last steamer, been altogether unsuccessful, as provision of all kinds brought the most exorbitant prices. We have the melancholy intelligence from Santa Fé, that thirty-two Californian emigrants had been murdered by the Indians on the plains.

In a letter from San Francisco, the writer says:—"Many will die in California, and many will repent the day they ever started for this far-off promised land." The writer (a Philadelphian) then adds:—

"Labour sells at from 20 to 50 cents per hour.

"We secured the services of a pilot from San Francisco to the diggings at Sacramento City, and we paid him 500 dollars!

"I had recovering from an attack of marsh fever; medicine, six dollars a bottle; physicians' fees too frightful to name.

"The work and exposure at the mines are beyond belief: three out of five return sick.

"A pair of chickens are worth five dollars; potatoes, 37½ c. per lb.

"Cannot live at all under three and four dollars a day.

"In conclusion, I would not advise any one of my friends to undertake so hazardous an adventure. Money in abundance is here; sickness, too, is here in all its destroying forms."

CANADA.

In Canada political affairs are, on the whole, of a quiescent character. The Government authorities at Toronto were exercising their power to put down the annexation movement, by dismissing every magistrate and militia officer whom they considered favourable to the project. There were constant rumours at Montreal of change in the Ministry, and of the being on the point of disruption; indeed, it was reported that a leading Lower Canada Tory had been sent for by Lord Elgin. At a meeting of the Montreal branch of the British American League, on Monday, it was stated that the following resolutions were adopted in favour of electing a Council of Confederate Union, for the purpose of adopting measures for securing the independent union of the British provinces of North America. A declaration in favour of annexation to the United States, signed by 10,000 persons, had been received from one of the counties of Lower Canada; and it was reported that, at the election at Quebec, M. Chabot, who had been appointed chairman of the board of works, was to be strongly opposed by an annexationist.

MEXICO.

We have very exciting news from Mexico, namely, that there had been a revolt in the army, and that in favour of the Americans. Vera Cruz had to land on the coast. It was, however, suppressed by the Government, after the loss of many lives; and some accounts say, that two editors, five officers of distinction, and twenty-seven soldiers had been executed.

The present Mexican Government, like all its predecessors, has become unpopular. Seditious movements are reported at Saltillo and other places. The American flag is publicly insulted by Mexicans are amongst the most fickle in the world—constantly changing, and for ever the sport of military leaders and factions.

WEST INDIES.

Intelligence to the 23rd ult. from Jamaica communicates the fact of the dissolution of the session of the Legislature up to that time, when a few days' vacation for the Christmas holidays took place. A proposition, emanating from Mr. Brutowe, a member of the "Native Negro Assembly party," proposing the levying of an "income-tax," was negatived by a considerable majority. The House of Assembly seemed to agree as to the necessity of at once making provision for the payment of the debt, and the upholding of the island's credit; the only difference which existed was as to the way in which such provision should be made. Mr. Lindo, member for St. Mary, and of the Country party, introduced a bill proposing to levy from 3d. to 1s. on each package of goods enumerated in the schedule attached to the bill. This measure, although not a party one, was likely to be agreed to after certain amendments to the schedule, for which purpose the bill had been referred to a select committee.

Very considerable dissatisfaction was evinced at the proposed alteration to be made in the route of the Royal mail packets, and the press of the island was loud in its disapprobation of the intended change, and strongly recommended the public to avail themselves of the American route (New York) steamers for the transit of letters, &c. The American steamers arrive at Jamaica regularly, and usually leave in time to transship any letters to the Cunard steamers leaving New York.

The Hon. Mr. Stanley, M.P., was still sojourning in the island. He had been frequently present at the Assembly, and had visited many other public places.

The weather was sultry. With the exception of a few cases of dysentery, which had made its appearance, the island was in a healthy state. The whole of the other islands were represented also as enjoying health.

War is again devastating the unfortunate island of Hayti. The Emperor Soulouque is making numerous efforts against the mulattoes of the other side of the island. Any particulars of the campaign are not given.

INDIA.

Accounts from Bombay to the 17th ult., and Calcutta to the 7th, have been received during the week. The only news of a hostile character is that of a somewhat extraordinary affair which has taken place in Sikkim, a small principality, formerly a dependency of Nepaul, near the frontier of Thibet, where two English officers, Doctor Campbell (the British Resident at Darjeeling) and his friend Doctor Hooker, both men of scientific repute, have been seized and thrown into confinement by the Rajah of that petty state, for having, in contravention of certain alleged treaties with the Thibet state, penetrated across that boundary line into the great table land beyond. The treatment of the prisoners is described as being barbarous and brutal. The dewan of the Rajah appears to have entertained the most implacable animosity towards Dr. Campbell; and hence much of the ill-treatment which that officer has experienced. Dr. Campbell's hands were bound in a cruel manner behind his back; and when he was asked questions, and delayed answering, the cords were tightened and drawn back with violence, so as to cause great pain.

Troops have been ordered to Darjeeling, for the chastisement of the Sikhim Rajah, and, at the same time, to effect the release of the two officers. It was reported that the country would be annexed to our dominions. The Commander-in-Chief, Sir C. Napier, has taken the occasion of a court-martial on Lieut. Pulman, of the artillery, found guilty of fraud and perjury, to read a eulogy on many military lectures to the military officers in India. It is couched in his official "remarks" upon the finding of the court-martial:—

"I never c—mmend the sentence of a court-martial that gave me more pain than I feel in confirming this, which denounces from the service a young man of whose qualities I have formed a high opinion (some years ago) he served under my command in the field. The service has lost a clever officer an honourable family is thrown into deep affection, and a young man of great promise is utterly ruined in his profession. For a vice which has ruined three others since my arrival in India! It is, therefore, impossible for me not to call upon all who have power, name, reputation, and respect for their calling, to join in the endeavour which I am making to repress those destructive vices which are so unfortunately prevalent in the European portion of the army, and which are the curse of India.

Courts-martial are ready to show all practicable mercy to a prisoner, but they will not, and cannot, sacrifice the honour of the military profession to indulgent feelings for an individual, and so cause the ruin of numbers

Their sentences shall be carried into effect. (Signed) C. J. NAPIER, General, Commander-in-Chief.

Notwithstanding former rumours to the contrary, it now appears that Sir Charles had no intention of returning to Europe till his term of service expired.

Sir W. Cotton continues still at Bombay, nothing having reached him to relieve him to his successor.

At Madras a famine is apprehended. the rains, which usually set in in October, had not begun to fall till the end of November, and were then excessively scanty.

The health of the Governor-General is said to be materially improved; by last accounts he was at Lahore, where a magnificent spectacle was expected on the occasion of the investment of Sir W. R. Gilbert with the insignia of a G.C.B. The noble Marquis was thence to proceed to Mooltan, and afterwards steam down the Indus to Kurrachee, where he was expected on the 15th of January to send at Bombay at the 30th.

The Marchioness of Dalhousie, it was generally understood, was about to return home immediately.

Rumours of insubordination in the north-west provinces were rife. At Delhi, on the 30th of November, reports were current regarding the determination of certain regiments under orders for the Punjaub not to cross the Sutlej, except on the same allowances as those that have hitherto been employed by the Europeans occupying that country, viz. extra pay; but Sir C. Napier was resolved to put down the movement as at arms.

There had been rather a serious affray at Hyderabad, in the Nizam's dominions, owing to the ill-will existing between the rival Mussulman sects of Soonees and Sheeahs, and which always rises to excess at the time of the celebration of the festival of the Mohurrum. The fanatic populace, during the riot, burnt a house to the ground, and some eight or ten people were killed.

CHINA.

From Hong-Kong, under date December 3, we have accounts of the safe return on the 1st of that month of the vessels of war which had gone, under command of Commander J. D. Hay, on a cruise against the formidable pirate Shapingtsai. The object of the expedition was crowned with complete success, nearly the whole of the piratical fleet having been destroyed, without any loss whatever on the side of the British.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

VICE-ADMIRAL SCHOMBERG

THE distinguished seaman was eldest son of the late Captain Sir A. Schomberg, R.N., of the family of a branch of that of the Counts of Schomberg, who commanded the king's troops, and fell at the battle of the Boyne, aged 80. The gallant Vice-Admiral entered the navy in April, 1785, as Lieutenant of Solebay; and he commanded a body of 40 seamen, in conjunction with the army under Sir Charles Grey, during the operations against Martinique, St. Lucia, and Guadaloupe. He also served on shore when an attempt was made to re-conquer the posts in the island last-mentioned. His subsequent career during the whole of the late war was glorious. After passing through the different grades, he became a Vice-Admiral the 23rd Nov., 1841.

Vice-Admiral Schomberg suggested to Lord Melville a plan, much approved of at the time, although eight or nine years elapsed before any of his suggestions were adopted, for victualling the seamen and marines of the fleet, wherein he was the first to propose the substitution of tea, sugar, &c., for half the usual allowance of spirits.

The Vice-Admiral married, first, Catharine Anna, only surviving daughter of S. B. Stepney, Esq., of Castle Durrow, King's County, Ireland; and secondly, 1st Oct., 1840, Mary, younger daughter of the late Admiral Sir Thomas Byam Martin, of Poulton-cum-Seacome, in Cheshire, whose mother had had the early care of, King George III. By his first marriage he had one son. Herbert, a commander R.N.; and three daughters, of whom Frederick Chalmers Morice, Esq., holds the same rank in the service; the younger, George Augustus, is a first-lieutenant R.M.A. (1834). Vice-Admiral Schomberg died recently, in the 75th year of his age.

ROBERT SHEDDEN, ESQ.

THE family of Shedden, originally of Scottish origin, has long been honourably connected with the commercial pursuits of the city of London, and many of its members have attained wealth. William Shedden, Esq., of Schomberg, who was father of the gentleman whose death we are about to record, was fourth son of Robert Shedden, Esq., the head of the well-known London house of Shedden, and brother of George Shedden, Esq., of Stanmore Park, co. Northampton. He married Wilhelmina, daughter of Captain William Miller, R.N., and died in 1820, leaving an only child, Robert Shedden, Esq., the subject of our present notice, who adopted the sea as an occupation

DESTRUCTION OF SHAP-'NG-TSAI'S PIRATICAL FLEET, BY THE BRITISH, IN THE GULF OF TONQUIN.

TOTAL DESTRUCTION OF A CHINESE PIRATICAL FLEET, IN THE GULF OF TONQUIN.

By the Overland Mail, which arrived on Sunday last, intelligence has been received of the total destruction of Shap-'ng-tsai's Piratical fleet of fifty-eight junks, in the Gulf of Tonquin, lat. 20.39.17 N, long. 106.59 E.

We have been favoured by Dr. Startin, medical officer of the Phlegethon, who was a participator and eye-witness of the action, with the accompanying Sketch of the engaging forces, at the moment of their opening fire, when the Pirate Commander's ship exploded, from a shell thrown by the Phlegethon. We gather from an interesting account, written by Dr. Startin, that the information which had been obtained by the Phlegethon, on her second cruise to the westward, of the rapine and murder committed by Shap-'ng-tsai on the south-west coast of China, and of his having escaped to Hainan, determined the naval Commander-in-Chief to dispatch a third expedition. After a persevering search, Captain Hay, in command, succeeded in obtaining, through the valuable assistance of Mr. Caldwell, the interpreter, such information as led to complete success. Dr. Startin's narrative continues :—

The expedition, consisting of her Majesty's brig Columbine, her Majesty's steamer Fury, and the Hon. Company's steamer Phlegethon, left Hong-Kong on the morning of the 8th of October, the Fury towing the Phlegethon to save fuel, and the Columbine sailing with a fair breeze. After searching and inquiring along the coast and adjacent islands, the vessels anchored at Nowchow, on the east coast of Lew-chew-foo, on the 12th, when intelligence was gained from the Mandarin that the pirates, having some idea that the English ships would be again sent in pursuit, had left Hainan—that they had visited Pak-hoi, a considerable town on the west coast of Leen-chew-foo—had captured five trading junks laden with produce, and totally destroyed the town and villages—and had left only a short time before for Weichow, a barren island to the north-east o the Gulf of Tonquin. Having procured pilots for the shoals, abounding in that part, and for the "Junk passage," Capt. Hay determined to follow

On the morning of the 13th, the Fury took both the Columbine and the Phlegethon in tow, much to the astonishment of the natives, and proceed to Hoihow, on the island of Hainan, after examining two suspicious junks anchored off the harbour. At 4 P.M. the fort on shore saluted the ships, which was returned by the Fury; and Captains Hay and Willcox, with Mr. Caldwell and others, paid a visit of ceremony to the Governor-General of Hainan. They were received with great state, and most graciously entertained. The Governor was delighted with the object of the expedition, more especially as Shap-'ng-tsai had made a vigorous attack on the city, being with great difficulty repelled, the approaches by water being too shallow for his large junks. He appointed a Mandarin with eight well-armed and fast-sailing junks to act as allies. The expedition started with the junks in company, the Mandarin being on board the Fury; and arrived at Wie-chow on the evening of the 15th, from whence the pirates had sailed for Chuck-shan, to which we followed them, the Fury towing both vessels, and arrived at noon. The Phlegethon searched for a passage into the harbour, without success.

The following day an armed boat was despatched to the village for intelligence, and to examine some junks reported inside. At 2 P.M. the boat returned with information that Shap-'ng-tsai had sailed westward to a place called Hoonong, near Tonquin, in consequence of the villagers refusing to cut grass which he required to burn and clean the bottoms of his junks in revenge for which he killed many of the inhabitants.

At daylight, the following morning, Capt. Hay proceeded under sail through the islands, calling at Goo-to-shan, and examining the junks. At five P.M. he sighted a large suspicious junk trying to escape among the islands, when the Columbine and Fury opened fire, but were out of range; the water shoaling, the Phlegethon was, in consequence, ordered in pursuit, when the junk was driven on shore. Her crew, thirty in number, landed in great disorder, when she was boarded, and found to contain five large guns, stink-pots, and thirty-one spears; the whole of which, with the junk herself, the Phlegethon's boats fired and destroyed. The following morning, at daylight, Capt. Hay sailed for the S.S.W., and arrived at noon off Hoe-nong, but no junks were in sight. Captains Hay and Willcox, with the Mandarin, &c., proceeded in the Phlegethon through the islands to the town, where information was obtained that the pirate fleet had been seen only two days before at Fa-fung, which place they had vowed to destroy after making an attack on another place, called Chuck-shan; and that three of their junks had been daily reconnoitring, but had not been observed on that day. Upon examining with a glass from the hills, nothing could be seen but a most fertile and beautiful country.

It was now resolved to return next morning; but, to satisfy the Hainan Mandarin, Captain Hay consented to look in at Chuck-shan, only ten miles westward. At daylight, on the 20th, suddenly, at 6h. 30m. A.M., numerous junks, appearing at first like a forest of trees, hove in sight to windward, over a point of low land. The Mandarin and villagers at once declared them to be Shap-'ng tsai's fleet endeavouring to escape to seaward. The channel being difficult to find, and very narrow, the Phlegethon proceeded ahead, showing soundings to the Fury, with the Columbine in tow.

After some difficulty, at three P.M., two boats came out from Fa-fung, with pilots to lead the vessels in, saying that Shap-'ng-tsai was himself there with 60 junks. Immediately on the pirates observing the approach of the steamers, many made sail up the river. Eleven of the largest ones, with springs on their cables, stood their ground, bringing their broadsides to bear and firing guns of defiance, also firing at the escaping junks to compel them to fight. At 4.30 P.M. the Fury opened fire at long range: the first few shots fell short, but must have given the desperadoes a significant warning of their approaching fate. The Phlegethon continued to lead, showing soundings, and when within about 1800 yards commenced firing both shell and rockets. The third or fourth discharge fired Shap-'ng-tsai's own junk, which was a large two-decker, mounting at least 40 guns, and, as the explosion showed, having a well-stored magazine: this explosion threw the whole piratical fleet into confusion, and set fire to the neighbouring junks.

The Columbine having now got within range, cast off and anchored, when the Fury rapidly advanced, discharging a perfect volcano of shot and shell. Up to this, the pirates had continued firing broadside after broadside; but finding their guns ranging immensely short, they made a last effort to escape on shore in boats. Perceiving this, the Fury and Phlegethon continued the pursuit, leaving the Columbine's boats to burn, destroy, and capture those left behind: the slaughter amongst the boats was fearful, and had not darkness intervened, the whole fleet must have been destroyed that night; the river having no outlet but that at which the English entered, and armed villagers on all sides mustering in thousands to cut them up on landing. Nearly all ran their junks on shore, under cover of the darkness, and deserted them, to be destroyed by fire by the boats of the expedition; and before ten o'clock, a dark night was completely illumined by the simultaneous burning of twenty-one large junks, some of them with captured cargoes of oil on board. The explosions were innumerable, and the boats much endangered by shotted guns, which were left loaded to the muzzle in most of the junks. Shap-'ng-tsai, being aware of the English power, was one of the first to decamp in a small sailing-boat with forty men, and it is supposed fell a victim to the grape and canister of the steamers.

The attack of the second day (the 21st) must be briefly described, though it was that on which many displayed the greatest courage, and f u.h. the hardest. The Fury, at daylight, continued the pursuit up the river as far as depth of water would allow, when her paddle-box-boats had to continue the chase of twelve large junks, some of which fought with great desperation, and well returned the boats' fire for an hour and a half, when, the boats' ammunition being nearly expended, they were compelled to board, and eventually succeeded in destroying nine of them. On board one of the largest the captain was found dead, at the rear of a gun loaded to the muzzle, and depressed directly to the boat, with the match burning in his hand. In the meantime, the Phlegethon, with Captain Hay on board, took another direction, knowing that many junks remained concealed in narrow creeks behind the hills, and where the larger steamer could not approach. This plan proved successful to the destruction of three other of the Pirate's finest vessels, a smaller one escaping outside. The boats of the Columbine had not been inactive, having destroyed many.

Only five of the fleet now remained undestroyed, two of which were pursued by the Phlegethon, and burnt; the remaining three, it was hoped, would fall into the hands of the Cochin-Chinese. Report says that, before leaving his vessel, Shap-'ng-tsai tied the Mandarin sent down by Seu with overtures to his mainmast, as a target for the guns which he believed his treacherous friend had brought into his last haunt—from which, by the perseverance and skill, both of those who planned and conducted the expedition, amidst many difficulties and dangers, in entirely unknown waters, he had been completely routed; and the remainder of his fleet, consisting of nearly sixty vessels—most of them of unusually large size and powerful armament—with upwards of 1000 guns and more than 2500 men, has been utterly destroyed, and this without a single casualty to the expedition. Lasting gratitude is due from the Chinese nation for this display of British power in their behalf. Shap-'ng-tsai, if he still exists, is, as the natives along the coast say, rendered powerless, and without any resources; and the merchants and traders, whose occupations were all but at an end, will now be able to pursue them with redoubled vigour, carrying cargoes up and down the coast (as they themselves say) "asleep."

TRIAL OF THE RIOTERS (OCT. 1) IN THE COURT-HOUSE AT TRINIDAD.

TRIAL OF THE RIOTERS AT TRINIDAD.

IN our Journal of November 10, 1849, we gave an account (with an Illustration) of the destructive riots which took place at Trinidad on the 1st of October, which led to loss of life, and outrage on person and property. Before the dispatch of this intelligence from the island, several persons who were most conspicuous in the riot had been arrested, and committed to prison.

These and other prisoners have since been brought to trial; and when the mail received on the 20th inst. left Trinidad, there was some excitement prevailing in the island relative to these trials, which were proceeding. The evidence against the prisoners did not make it appear that there was any preconcert or plot to break the peace on the occasion of the disturbance; and the Jury, after two days' confinement, not being able to agree upon a verdict, were discharged. On the 21st of December, the Attorney-General summoned another Jury, which, it was expected, would convict the prisoners, who consisted of ten men (ignorant labourers) and four women, all Negroes. It was the general opinion in the island, that, if these helpless persons should be condemned, the year 1850 will not elapse without serious disturbances.

The accompanying Illustration is from a Sketch by Mr. Cazabon, a native artist of Trinidad. It shows the interior of the Court-House, on the 17th of December, during the trial. Upon the bench are seated Chief Justice Knox and Justice Bowen; below them are the Registrar and the Marshal of the Court; in the witness-box is Mr. Gaskappt; the barrister standing is Mr. Anderson, counsel for the defence; and to his right are the Hon. Henry Fuller, Advocate and member of Council; and next to him, Mr. Celestine Surrera, the chief prisoner.

We are happy to add, that, by letters and papers to the 21st of December, the weather was favourable for vegetation, and to all appearance the dry season had set in; the canes looked well, labour was abundant and cheap, so that, if the weather held up, an unusually large crop was expected. Trade was somewhat more lively under the smile of the coming Christmas.

PURCHASE OF PRIOR PARK.—Many rumours having for some time past been current in Bath with respect to the Roman Catholic College of Prior Park, the question is now decided; inasmuch as Alexander Raphael, Esq., of Turnham-place, M.P. for St. Alban's, has purchased the above property, with all its appurtenances, for £30,000; and has given an extended lease of it to the same parties at a rental of £3 per cent. per annum. The property will be conveyed to them on their payment of the above sum, together with the rents due thereon. But in failure of the strict performance of the several stipulations and covenants expressed in the lease, their right to the repurchase of the property will be forfeited.

The sum of £200 has been subscribed for the erection of a memorial window in Chester Cathedral, in memory of the late G. E. Anson, Esq., treasurer of Prince Albert's household, and son of the Very Rev. the Dean of Chester.

ABORIGINAL AUSTRALIANS—YOUNG MEN.

DAGUERREOTYPED IN PORT PHILLIP BY MR. KILBURN.

ABORIGINAL AUSTRALIANS—OLD AND YOUNG MAN.

AUSTRALIA FELIX.

By a singular occurrence, we are enabled to present our readers with the accompanying Portraits of a group of the Aboriginal people of the interior of Australia, most appropriately called by Sir Thomas Mitchell Australia Felix, now better known as Port Phillip.

It appears that Mr. Kilburn, the brother of the eminent Photographer, of Regent-street, has long resided in Australia, and felt anxious to portray the curious race of Aborigines by aid of the Daguerréotype. Mr. Kilburn had much difficulty in prevailing upon any individual to sit, from some superstitions fear that they possess, imagining that it would subject them to some misfortune. He lost no opportunity in persuading them, by small bribes, when they wandered into Port Phillip, usually for the purpose of begging; but, in return, they appeared always willing to render any assistance in chopping wood, &c. At length, Mr. Kilburn succeeded; and the result is here presented to the reader.

First, are two young men, the one holding his waddy, or club of defence; the other, the characteristic boomerang: the latter is also decorated with a short spear thrust through the cartilage of the nose. Accompanying, are Portraits of an Old and Young Man. Next is "Lubra," a young woman, with her hunting spear. They tattoo themselves only to a limited extent, as shown in the Illustration. They wear sheep-skins, with the wool next the skin, or the reverse, according to the season.

Dr. J. B. Clutterbuck, in a very interesting account of "Port Phillip in 1849" (just published), tells us that—

"Our sable brethren are extremely dirty in their persons; their legs, arms, and other parts of the body are frequently covered with eruptions—partly from their inattention to ablution, partly from their custom of sleeping with a mongrel breed of dog, which is infected with the disease called the 'mange.' The native colour of their skin is dark brown; their faces are oval, nose flat, and upper lips very thick. The hair, unlike that of the African Negro, is straight and smooth, and worn daubed with a profusion of any unctuous substance which they can procure, and this often blended with red earth. A cockatoo feather is sometimes stuck at the side of the head, and the cartilage of the nose pierced, and a reed, about an inch in length, passed through it. A necklace, composed of short pieces of reed united, encircles their neck; and around their person is carelessly thrown an opossum rug, on the skin of which are carefully depicted, by means of glass or stone, various devices, by no means inelegant in design, and somewhat resembling the arabesque. The Manchester calico-printers might derive some useful hints from the delineations of this simple people. The fur of this rug is worn next the skin, or otherwise, according to the season of the year. Their teeth are so even, perfect, and beautifully white, that, were they seen by the Cranbourn-alley dentists, their possession would be coveted. Young boys and girls go about without any clothing. Some of the tribes mutilate themselves, by allowing the two front teeth to be knocked out when they attain the condition of manhood. They are fond of puncturing, by means of sharp pieces of flint, different parts of their persons when young. These punctures cause inflammation and swelling, leaving ridges, resembling the form, shape, and size of a large leech. In stature they are usually diminutive, but tolerably well proportioned: their feet and hands are small, their legs straight, limbs finely rounded, and their deportment far more dignified than artificial, tuition could impart.

LUBRA, A YOUNG AUSTRALIAN WOMAN.

We append a striking View of Melbourne, the capital of Port Phillip, copied by permission from a print after a picture by Mr. W. F. E. Liardet; dedicated to his Honor C. J. La Trobe, the Superintendent; and just published under the patronage of the Mayor, burgesses, merchants, and gentlemen settlers of the district. In the foreground of the picture are some specimens of the vegetation of the country; with a native wigwam, bundles of spears, and the aborigines practising with their hunting and war implements. The lofty point, commencing from the left of the picture, is Mount Macedon; next is Flag-staff Hill, to signalise arrivals in the Bay; towards the centre is the Episcopal Church; next, the New Prison and Supreme Court-House; and to the extreme right lies Collingwood, or the New Town, hidden by the trees. Upon the river (Yarra-Yarra, or Ever-flowing) are steamers and other vessels, which attest the commercial activity of the place.

We quote a portion of Dr. Clutterbuck's description of the city:—

"Some twelve years ago, the land on which a city now stands was a wilderness—a wilderness inhabited by innumerable tribes of savages; and where, also, the sportive kangaroo, emu, and wild dog appeared in such numbers as to oppose a barrier to the inroads of civilization. "What a change has taken place since that period! What has not been achieved in this once barbarous region by England's indomitable and noble spirit of enterprise! Perhaps, in no portion of its globe has so gigantic an effort at colonization been crowned with so signal and speedy a triumph as in the erection of Melbourne, with a population of at least 15,000 souls.

"Melbourne is prettily situate upon sloping banks, and overlooks, in many parts, the bay; fronting, on the north, the Yarra Yarra. On the western side there is an extensive swamp, or rather lake, it being usually covered in its whole extent with water, on the surface of which numerous flocks of ducks and other wild-fowl sport.

"Most of the modern houses are two stories in height, and built of brick; but these, with very few exceptions, are inconvenient and low, and ill adapted to the enjoyment of one of the chief comforts which persons inhabiting a hot climate should endeavour to provide, namely, free ventilation. The roofs of nearly all the houses are covered with shingles, some few with slate, and, in the bush, the majority with bark.

"Little architectural taste or design is displayed in the public buildings. The gaol, court-house, and Government offices are plain structures of stone.

"The principal streets are wide; and, since Melbourne has been ted its corporation, much has been effected by this body towards the formation of level, compact lines of road, and the metalling their surface.

"The city is supplied with tolerably pure water from the Yarra Yarra, a dam having been constructed below the wharf for the purpose of preventing the admixture of salt and brackish water.

"The wharf, composed of strong piles of wood well riveted and driven into the side of the bank of the basin, presents a bustling and lively scene. Here several schooners discharge their cargoes from Sydney, Hobarton, Launceston, Adelaide, and other ports. Cargoes are brought up from the bay in lighters. Three steamers play between Melbourne and Geelong daily; and one to and from Sydney and Launceston twice a week. Between the two capitals, Sydney and Melbourne, postal communication takes place in the same period. A very handsome bridge, built of blue stone, and faced and ornamented with white granite, is thrown over the Yarra. It consists of one arch, and equals the span of the largest arch of the new London-bridge. Altogether it is a fine specimen of architecture.

MELBOURNE, THE CAPITAL OF PORT PHILLIP.

"A police-office, hospital, mechanics' institute, theatre, and indifferent barracks have been erected. A good race-course and a botanical garden have likewise been formed—the latter principally through the instrumentality of his Honor Mr. La Trobe, the Superintendent of Port Phillip.

"The Church of England has two places of worship; one, St. James's Church, a cumbrous, heavy-looking edifice in the eastern; the other, St. Peter's, a neat building of brick, in the western quarter of the town. The former is capable of holding about 800 persons; the latter about 450. A third church is much required for the central portion of the city; as are also school buildings. The Roman Catholics have built a handsome church, and contemplate the erection of another. There are also a Scotch kirk, an Independent, and a Wesleyan Ieyan chapel.

The environs of Melbourne are not enlivened by much natural beauty of scenery. The south banks of the Yarra are, perhaps, the only parts that within a distance of three miles from the city display variety. On these many pretty cottages lie scattered, bounded behind by hills and bold woodland, and surrounded by fertile and productive gardens, extending over a gently-undulating declivity to the water's edge."

MANCHESTER ROYAL HOSPITAL for the INSANE, near Cheadle, Cheshire.
HONORARY TREASURER—John Shuttleworth, Esq.
PHYSICIAN—The Physicians of the Manchester Royal Infirmary.
ACTING PHYSICIANS FOR THE YEAR—Peter Wood, M.D., and Charles W Bell, M.D., K.L.S.
RESIDENT MEDICAL SUPERINTENDENT—Thomas Dickson, Esq., L.R.C.S.E.
SECRETARY—Mr. Joshua Radford

This hospital, instituted in 1763, has just been rebuilt at an expense of about £50,000, in a retired and healthy part of the beautiful district of Cheadle, and is now open for the admission of patients. Every modern improvement has been adopted to render it for the purpose of the kind, and being incorporated by act of Parliament with the [illegible] hospital, offers to those requiring advantages in respect of medical and general treatment, equivalent to those where none of the poor are entitled there to the benefit of county asylums, with the further option to adapt its rate of payments to the circumstances of each case; and by reserving superior apartments and accommodation for the more affluent classes of higher rates, also at receiving those in reduced circumstances at proportionally low charges. The payments are required in advance, weekly or monthly.

Further information may be obtained by applying personally, or by letter, to the Resident Medical Officer at the Hospital; or to Mr. Radford, Secretary, Manchester Royal Infirmary.

J L D.—A man's eldest sister and his dead daughter have equal precedence

A CONSTANT READER.—There are certain marks of cadency used in heraldry, to distinguish the junior from the senior members of a family. The elder has should bear the hereditary arms without any addition; the younger son, with a crescent, a mullet, or martlet, as the case may be

KA, OKO.—There are no arms registered to the family in question

J F.—We think the case submitted is determined by that of the Duke of Norfolk. His Grace, as Hereditary Earl Marshal, bears, behind his shield of arms, two trumpets, or Marshal's staves, in saltire or, mounted as the symbols of the dignity he inherits; but these insignia do not devolve on any of his descendants, except those in actual possession of the office of Earl Marshal

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, 1849.

MR. COBDEN'S characteristic is strong common-sense, which rarely deserts him, except when he gets upon the subject of Russia and the morality of money-lending. When he confines himself to the expediency and prudence of lending money to Russia or to any foreign power, his common-sense is again in the ascendant. He then makes out a case which no capitalist, seeking for a real investment, can read or listen to without a strong inclination to draw his purse-strings tight, and leave his money in the British funds—in railways, in docks, at mortgage, or in the Bank—anywhere, in fact, except in the stocks of a foreign state, Republican or Monarchical, American or European, liberal or despotic.

At the meeting held at Sheffield, on Tuesday evening, Mr. Cobden avoided the subject of the Russian Loan, and refrained from preaching those ultra peace principles which, if carried into effect by any one State in the present ignorant and brutal state of the majority of the nations of the world, would virtually consign that State to be overrun and conquered by the rapacious and the violent. He preferred to dwell, with his usual force and perspicacity, upon the tendency of Free-Trade to cement kindliness of feeling and strengthen the bonds of mutual interest between the nations, and, consequently, to lead in due time to the abolition of the foolish wars that have overwhelmed Europe with difficulty, debt, and peril. "At this time," said Mr. Cobden, "there were more armed men on the Continent than there were during the wars of Napoleon." Mr. Cobden might have added, that not only the despotic but the free States were in the miserable predicament of maintaining enormous armies, and that even Republican Switzerland, which he held up to the envy of the surrounding Monarchies, was crushed by the weight of unproductive hosts. The total amount in men of the forces of Russia is not very clearly known; but the Almanack de Gotha, an excellent authority, gives the number of its battalions, companies, and squadrons of horse, from which an approximative estimate may be formed. The regular army of Russia is composed of 776½ battalions and 553 companies of infantry, 583 squadrons of cavalry, 290½ battalions of artillery, and 67 battalions of engineers, besides a multitudinous horde of Cossacks. The contingent supplied to the Germanic Confederation by Austria amounts to 236,529 men and 472 guns, besides 398,823 men required for the other portions of her heterogeneous dominions. Prussia keeps up a force of 121,100 men, besides the landwehr of 96,100. The small state of Bavaria has a force of 90,097 men; Saxony, 36,728; Hanover, 36,000; Wurtemburg, 35,050; and Baden, 27,334. The other petty German states have armies of proportionate magnitude. The free city of Hamburg, with a population which scarcely equals that of the borough of Marylebone, or even the parish of St. Pancras, supplies a force of 3560 men for war purposes. Even the small town of Bremen, with a population of 72,820, somewhat larger than Camden and Kentish-towns, keeps up 1295 men to feed the great Moloch of war. Republican Switzerland, so far back as 1841, kept up a federal army of 64,019 men and 3426 horses; and since that time the amount of her armaments has been very greatly increased. As for France, she is actually eaten up by soldiers, and maintained, in 1848 and 1849, upwards of 500,000 men and 100,000 horses. Such is the deplorable state of Continental Europe! When these nations shall trade with each other, when they shall abolish their vexatious and mischievous custom-houses, and learn that the industry and wealth of each is essential to the well-being and happiness of all, the principles of peace will follow the cargoes of commerce, and war will grow into disfavour—not perhaps because nations will think it any great crime, as the last argument to be resorted to, but because they will discover it to be anti-commercial and consequently stupid. Mr. Cobden, while he was upon the subject of Free-Trade, might have remembered that the Emperor of Russia is desirous of Free-Trade with this country, and have set off that fact against the warlike necessities of his position. Free-Trade will ultimately be the peacemaker; and, until Free-Trade shall be established with Russia, and with all other warlike States—not forgetting the warlike Republics of America—we quite agree with Mr. Cobden, that our wisest and most profitable policy is to develop our own resources with our own money. "We have never," he said, "sufficiently estimated the advantages we possess in these islands. If it were possible that a man were offered the privilege of creating a territory out of the ocean to the extent of these two islands, I have often thought that the imagination could hardly place islands in such a favourable position, and endow them with so many natural advantages, and people them with a more enterprising and industrious race than we possess. At a time when the possession of the minerals decides the fate and rank of nations, we have been exporting, in one and the same year, coal, iron, lead, tin, and copper to every country in the Continent of Europe; thus showing the immense advantages we possess over every other country. How is it that, with these vast advantages, such a large portion of our population are not so prosperous as we might have expected? How is it that we find such an amount of pauperism and misery? I believe it has mainly arisen from the delusion which has so long prevailed in this country—that we were profiting by waging wars and conquering territories, and taking possession of barren deserts in every quarter of the globe; heaping up debt and taxation upon our population, and trying to maintain exclusive trade with these countries."

While Mr. Cobden talks in this manner, the reason of the people will go along with him. The morality of the subject of wars, and of loans to States that maintain armies, is another matter—by far too wide for a discussion intended to lead to a practical result. All debt is in a sense immoral, and the titanic debt of Great Britain is no exception. If Mr. Cobden will not allow us, directly or indirectly, to encourage immorality in any shape, what is to become of the cotton manufacturer? of the tobacco trade? of the sugar trade? and of various others, that are supported by the bones and blood of slaves? Such arguments, if carried to their legitimate conclusion, would abolish calico shirts and the printed goods of Manchester; and conscientious men would resign themselves to smoke no more, to snuff no more, and to pay a shilling a pound for sugar to our friends in the West Indies. Let him confine himself to the commercial question, and he will bring conviction to the minds of many who now hold themselves aloof from him. "The old objects of war," as he truly said at Sheffield—"to seize territory—were dissipated the moment they had Free-Trade, for more good was to be got by trading with the people than by conquering them." And far more good, we will add, might be done by Mr. Cobden, and by Free-Traders generally, if they would meet the commercial liberality of the Emperor of Russia in a similar spirit, than by abusing him, or hunting at the dismemberment of his empire as a probable and not altogether undesirable event. We want to trade with Russia, and with every other country that will trade with us. We neither want to fight with, nor to vilify them.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

The Queen, the Prince Consort, and the youthful members of the Royal family continue to enjoy the enjoyment of excellent health. Her Majesty will not open Parliament in person next week, in consequence of the near approach of an event calculated to add to the happiness of the Royal domestic circle, which is expected to take place early in April.

The Duke and Duchess de Nemours and the Earl of Carlisle have been among the guests of her Majesty and the Prince during the past week. His Royal Highness has been out shooting with the Duke de Nemours several times and has also taken a ride on horseback, accompanied by her Majesty, the Prince of Wales, and Prince Alfred, and attended by the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, drove to Frogmore, where Prince Albert and the gentlemen in attendance on him enjoyed the diversion of skating on the ornamental lake, the Queen and the Duchess of Kent being spectators.

On Tuesday morning, the Queen took an early walk on the slopes, accompanied by the Royal children. The Prince devoted the morning to shooting.

The same round of exercises and amusement followed on Wednesday.

On Thursday his Royal Highness Prince Albert came to London and presided at a meeting of the Royal commission for the promotion of the Exhibition of the Works of Industry of All Nations. His Royal Highness returned to the Castle at five o'clock. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at the Castle during the morning, and partook of luncheon with her Majesty. In the evening, the Queen and the Prince Consort dined with the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore. The Royal suite consisted of the Countess of Charlemont, Lord Camoys, Sir Frederick Stovin, General Bowles, Lord Charles Fitzroy, and Colonel F. H. Seymour. Colonel the Hon Charles and Mrs. Grey had also the honour of receiving invitations, and joined the Royal circle at dinner.

The Duchess of Kent has been a frequent guest at the Queen's table during the week.

The Hon. Miss Macdonald has relieved the Hon. Miss Cavendish in her duty as Maid of Honour in Waiting to the Queen.

Lord Camoys and Major-General Sir Frederick Stovin have relieved the Earl of Listowel and Colonel Hon R. Boyle in their duties as Lord and Groom in Waiting to her Majesty.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at her residence, Clarence House, St. James's, on Wednesday, from Frogmore House. Her Royal Highness visited the Duchess of Gloucester, at Gloucester House, and afterwards left town on her return to Frogmore House.

The Marquis of Lansdowne (Lord President of the Council) has issued invitations for a full dress dinner at Lansdowne House, on Wednesday next, to the mover and seconder of the Address in the House of Lords, and a party of Peers.

The Earl Grey (Secretary for the Colonies) has removed from his mansion in Belgrave-square, to his new residence on Carlton-house-terrace, lately in the occupation of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone.

The Earl of Minto (Lord Privy Seal) arrived in town on Tuesday evening, from Scotland.

Viscountess Palmerston will commence her attractive political réunions this evening (Saturday), at the residence of her noble husband, on Carlton-house-terrace.

Viscount St. Lawrence has left town on a Continental tour.

The Baroness Brunnow, wife of his Excellency the Russian Minister, commences the fashionable season on Wednesday next, with a thé dansant, at Chesterfield House.

Lady John Russell gave the first of a series of assemblies on Wednesday evening, at the private residence of the First Lord of the Treasury, in Chesham-place. Lady John's parties will be continued next week, and every Wednesday during the ensuing month.

Lord Brougham leaves Paris on Monday next for London.

APPROACHING MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—We are enabled to announce that the preliminaries are arranged for the marriage of the Lady Harriet Somers Cocks, second daughter of the Earl and Countess Somers, with Mr. Wegg Prosser, M.P.—We have also to announce the approaching marriage of Mr. Stanhope, eldest son of Lord and Lady Stanhope, the Earl, and grandson of the late Archbishop of York, with Miss Mills, eldest daughter of Mr. Charles Mills, of Carnsfield House.—The engagement of Lieut. the Hon. Philip Sydney, of the Royal Horse Guards, eldest son of Lord and Lady Sydney, grandson of the late King William the Fourth, and Miss Foulis, only daughter and heiress of the late Sir William Foulis, Bart., and Lady Foulis, will be solemnised towards the close of the ensuing month.—We understand the intended marriage of Lady Olivia Montagu, only daughter of the Duke of Manchester, with Lord Osmington, M.P., eldest son of the Earl and Countess of Tankerville, will be solemnised, on Tuesday next, at Kimbolton Castle.—According to present arrangements, the marriage of Miss Bagot, daughter of the late Bishop of Bath and Wells and Lady Harriott Bagot, and the Hon. G. T. Orlando Bridgeman, son of the Earl of Bradford, will take place in the course of next month.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF CHELSEA.—A public meeting of the inhabitants of Chelsea was held on Wednesday evening, at the Commercial Hall, King's-road, to take into consideration the best means of procuring separate parliamentary representation for the extensive district comprised within the united parishes of Kensington, Chelsea, Hammersmith, and Fulham. The meeting, which was exceedingly well attended, passed the following resolutions :—

That this meeting is of opinion that great injustice was done to Chelsea, Kensington, Fulham, and Hammersmith, at the period of passing the Reform Bill, inasmuch as the franchise was given to various boroughs throughout the kingdom inferior in population, wealth, and intelligence, whilst this important district was wantonly omitted

That the number of representatives to be returned to the House of Commons having been fixed by the Reform Act at 658, and that number having been reduced to 656 by the disfranchisement of Sudbury, this district is better entitled to supply that deficiency in the representation than any other place in the United Kingdom

That a petition embodying the foregoing resolutions be signed by the chairman of this meeting, and prese nted to the House of Commons, and that Joseph Hume, Esq., M.P., be requested to present the same.

PAROCHIAL WATER SUPPLY ASSOCIATION.—A meeting of the members of this association was held on Tuesday evening in the Ve-try-room of St. Paul's Church, Covent-Garden, to receive the report of the committee appointed at St. Martin's on the 7th instant, and for the transaction of general business. The chair was taken by Mr. Wyld, M.P., who stated that about fifteen parishes of the metropolis have already given in their adhesion to the principles of the association, and eight of the vestries have voted different sums for the payment of solicitors' fees, amounting in all to about £160. The present claims on the association are £63. J. Wyld, Esq., M.P. for Bodmin, offered to advance a sum of £500 to enable the committee to discharge all preliminary expenses, which was to be repaid when the funds of the association should be in a sufficiently prosperous condition, and on the terms that no member should be personally liable for the repayment of the amount. The committee recommended that Mr. Wyld's offer should be accepted with thanks, and that that gentleman should be appointed pro tem., until application should be made to J. Masterman, Esq., M.P., and Baron Rothschild to become joint treasurers of the association. The report concluded with recommending an active canvass of those parishes which have not yet joined the movement. It was stated that the principles which the association seeks to establish are, that the water supply of the metropolis should not be in the hands of joint-stock companies, and that it should not be subject to the principle of centralisation by Government, as in the case of sewers, but should be under the control of the rate-payers of the different parishes. The report, after some discussion on Mr. Wyld's proposal, was received and adopted. Mr. Browne was appointed the secretary on a short term of engagement, Mr. Sidney Smith, to whom the office had been offered, having declined to accept it. It was referred to the committee to procure offices in the city for the transaction of the business of the association.

THE BALLAST-HEAVERS OF THE METROPOLIS.—On Tuesday, a meeting of the following gentlemen took place at the London Tavern: Sir James Duke, Bart., M.P., in the chair; Mr Pearson, M.P.; Mr. Pewtress, Mr. Millard, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Dalle, Mr. John Wood, the Rev. Mr. Cadby, Mr. Hodges, and Mr. Delane. The object of the meeting was to take into consideration the state of the ballast-heavers and lumpers employed on the Thames. Mr. Mayhew detailed at some length the grievances complained of by the ballast-heavers and lumpers, in consequence of the objectionable manner in which they are at present paid for their laborious employment. Mr. Pewtress entered into a statement of benefits derived by the coal-whippers from the act of Parliament passed for their protection, and which regulated the manner in which they were employed and paid. He drew a strong contrast between their former and their present condition. They had created a fund of their own, out of which they had established a school for their children and a benefit society; and, by a subscription of a penny per man per ship, they had formed another fund, which enabled them to grant pensions to the infirm members of their body. Nothing could be more gratifying than their clean and respectable appearance whenever they met together.—The following resolutions were subsequently agreed to unanimously :—

1. That the inquiries made by the Morning Chronicle into the state of Labour and the Poor having disclosed the great extent of misery and destitution which constantly prevails amongst the labouring classes, produced chiefly by the more in which they are at present employed, and so objectionable as to their wages as to call for immediate redress; and in this meeting that, without in the slightest degree interfering with the rights of employers, some measure should be taken to abolish the evils of the present system, and to secure to the labourers the regular payment of their wages

2. That it appears that the ballast-heavers employed in the service of the Corporation of the Trinity House are well paid, but that the ballast-heavers employed to shovel the ballast out of the Trinity House lighters are sufferers from the objectionable system by which they are employed and paid. That a sub-committee be appointed to communicate with the Corporation of the Trinity House, and to ascertain whether consistently with their regulations, the ballast-heavers cannot be placed under the control of the Trinity House in the same manner as the ballast-lighters. That the committee be also authorised to communicate with her Majesty's Government, and such other parties as may be deemed necessary, with a view to the attainment of the objects of the foregoing resolutions. The committee to consist of the gentlemen now present

The thanks of the meeting were then unanimously voted to Sir James Duke for his kind and prompt attention to the objects of the meeting.

ROYAL NAVAL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—A quarterly meeting of this society took place on Monday, at the Thatched House Tavern, St. James's-street; the Chevalier de Bunsen, Governor of Greenwich Hospital, in the chair. The minutes of the last meeting having been confirmed, a statement of accounts was read, which showed that the expenses for the last year were £582 17s, leaving a balance in favour of the society of £202 12s. Considerable discussion took place relative to the item marked incidental expenses (£179), which it was urged was very large, and that some better classification in the accounts should be adopted. A list of forty-one new subscribers was then read, and also the deaths, and it appeared that there had been 39 new subscribers, and 116 deaths. Still the amount of subscriptions had increased, for the amount they had gained by the new subscribers was £81, and the loss from the deceased was only £65. Particular attention was called to the claims of the daughter of Lieutenant Charles Mackenzie for admission to the Royal Naval Female School, they being founded on the services of her father, who, it might be observed, was not the one of the same family strictly naval) who perilled his life during the French revolutionary war, his brother also, Commander James Mackenzie, having been drowned in her Majesty's brig Pickle, in the Atlantic, in 1809, on her passage home from Halifax; other of the family having also been lost in the service of the country. The secretary having read a series of correspondence from various parties, Sir John West was elected vice president, in room of Sir J. Hawkins Whitshed, Bart., deceased; and Captain Eckersan, Captain Shark, and Lieutenant Hall were appointed as a committee to examine memorials for the next year. After some formal business, strangers were ordered to withdraw, the remaining business being discussed with closed doors.

PROVIDENT CLERKS' MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.—On Monday night the ninth annual meeting of the Provident Clerks' Association was held at the London Tavern, Mr. R. H. Jones in the chair. The report stated that a considerable increase had taken place during the past year, both in the number of policies taken out, and in the amount of assurances effected. In the last year, 368 policies were issued, for £115,865, the annual premiums upon which amount to £3242. There were 97 proposals for assurance declined, and 59 were deferred, windrawn, and waiting for further information. The business of the association for 1849 had greatly exceeded that of any year since its formation; and there was at the close of the year 1849, 1,121 policies in existence, assured by four deaths, owing to cholera and diarrhœa. In the course of last year, a deputation from the board of management had visited Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, and Leeds, on the subject of the society, and the negotiations were most cordially received by the principals of many of the leading houses, and the business had since considerably increased. The accounts for the year exhibited gross receipts for £11,321 3s. 8d., and a total income of £4944 9s. 11d. in favour of the association. The Chairman congratulated the meeting on the progress made by the association during the past year. He said that they had reached a position to extend the sphere of its operations; and he had himself gone to Dublin to make inquiries respecting the expediency of that step; but, from the conflicting statements that had been made to him, he came to the opinion that it would not be desirable to do so. The report and the balance-sheet were unanimously adopted for the sum of £400 was awarded to the board of management, for the great attention bestowed by them to the interests of the society.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The seventeenth annual meeting of this society was held at Exeter-hall on Tuesday evening; Mr. Harrison, the president, in the chair. From the report and accounts it appeared there had been increased public support during the past year, and the number of members had in 1844. The subscription list had considerably increased, in proof of which it was stated that while the amount received in 1848 had been the largest of any preceding year, and had exceeded that of 1847 by £100, the past year's subscription had exceeded that of 1848 by upwards of £150. This might be considered as partly proceeding from the satisfaction felt by the subscribers at the introduction, for the first time this season, of numbered sittings in the centre of the area reinstead the entire evening, similar to the stalls at the Philharmonic concerts and the Opera. The gross receipts for 1849 had been £9225 10s. 1d., and the payments £8168 6s. 7d., allowing for the purchase of music for the use of the orchestra, which is bought, instead of, as formerly, being only hired); it was stated that the past year's operations had realised a considerable profit. The assets of the society consisted of £1000 Consols; in addition to other property, of the value of at least £1000; besides the cash balance in the hands of the treasurer; every claim upon the society having been paid. The retiring members of the committee having been re-elected, the usual complimentary resolutions in reference to the labours of the committee and officers of the past year were unanimously passed, and Mr. Costa's indefatigable exertions in behalf of the institution were particularly noticed

SIR KATHARINE'S DOCK COMPANY.—The half-yearly general meeting of the proprietors of the above company was held on Monday at the Dock-house, Tower-hill. By the balance-sheet it appeared that the total receipts for the year ending Dec. 31 had been £316,377 6s. 2d., and the expenditure £137,601 12s. 1d.; payment of dividend, £102,325 16s. 10d.; leaving a balance in hand of £56,447 14s. 3d. On the motion of the chairman the report was adopted, and it was also agreed that the dividend for the year should be at the rate of 4 per cent, payable half-yearly at 2 per cent, free of income-tax. A vote of thanks to the chairman terminated the business of the meeting.

ROYAL JENNERIAN AND LONDON VACCINE ESTABLISHMENT.—The annual meeting of the governors of this institution took place on Thursday last, at the London Tavern—D. W. Wire, Esq., in the chair. The report stated that, during the past year, the numbers vaccinated by this institution amounted to 7800, which was a very large increase over the preceding years They had been applied to for a supply of vaccine from the Honourable East India Company, and by many of the foreign Governments. The Spanish government liberally aided them by subscribing to their funds, and the medical board of Palma, in Majorca, also subscribed; still the actual amount they had received during the past year was only £332, leaving them still in debt to the amount of £350. The report was adopted, and several formal resolutions passed, and the meeting separated, after a vote of thanks to the chairman.

THE JOURNEYMEN TAILORS AND THE SLOP SYSTEM.—A meeting of the journeymen tailors was held at the Hopkins' Institution, Southampton-buildings, on Thursday evening, Mr. Luke James Hansard in the chair, when a series of resolutions was passed, in order to put an end to the slop system and the middlemen, to the effect that a "Tailors' Working Association" should be formed on the co-operative system; other trades being invited to aid the tailors in their efforts.

FEMALE EMIGRATION.—The sub-committee appointed to consider the most advisable mode of carrying out some of the most important objects of Mr. Sidney Herbert's great scheme, have made their report, which they divide into the subjoined heads: 1st. The proper selection of emigrants. 2nd. The most effectual mode of protecting the emigrants during their transit to the colonies. 3rd. The aid and protection to be granted to them on landing. 4th. The cost of their outfit and passage. One of the indispensables to selection is good character. The most strict inquiries are to be instituted on this point; and, "in order to test the character and habits of the candidates for emigration," a preliminary "home" is proposed to be established, where their conduct can be watched prior to embarkation. "Assisted emigration" is to form a feature in the operations, and, under all measures are recommended to ensure the full efficacy of the arrangements. The report has been adopted, and a committee of selection has already been appointed "to prepare a list of fifty candidates for emigration."

ADMISSION OF SOLICITORS.—The Master of the Rolls has appointed Monday, Jan. 28, at the Rolls Court, Chancery-lane, at three o'clock in the afternoon, for swearing solicitors. Every person desirous of being sworn on the roll of solicitors of the courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, for the current year at the secretary's office, Rolls-yard, Chancery-lane, on or before Saturday, Jan. 26.

THE DRAINAGE AND SEWERAGE OF LAMBETH.—A very extensive and thorough drainage of the whole of this large parish is now in the course of being made, under the superintendence of the Commissioners of Sewers, preparatory to an effective system of drainage being introduced throughout this immensely populated district.

FIRE IN THE TEMPLE CHURCH.—On Sunday morning, about half-past nine o'clock, the man employed in lighting the furnace by which the Inner Temple Church is warmed having performed his duty in the choristers'-room, which is over the furnace. He had not been in the room many minutes before he was alarmed by the report of an explosion immediately beneath him; on re-entering the furnace-room to ascertain the cause of the noise he found the place in flames, which he made an ineffectual effort to extinguish by pouring several pails of water over them. He was nearly suffocated by the dense smoke, and was removed in a state of insensibility by some persons who fortunately came to the spot. After the engines had progressed. The engine-hose was carried round the church from Fleet-street, and the flames after some difficulty extinguished. A great part of the flooring of the choristers'-room was, however, burnt, but fortunately the sacred edifice escaped without injury, and divine service in the morning was performed as usual. An inquiry into the cause of the fire has shown, that for some time past the man in charge of the furnace-room had been in the habit of piling bundles of wood over the boiler of the furnace to dry. On Saturday last a great quantity was placed there; and on Sunday morning, shortly after the fires were lighted, the heat of the boiler set the whole of the wood in flames. The explosion was caused by the bursting of the state roof, from the action of the fire.

STATISTICS OF LONDON FIRES IN 1849.—The total number of serious fires during the year, at some of which the premises were entirely destroyed, amounted to 570; the average which was the number which destroyed the warehouses of Messrs. Gooch and Cousins, in London-wall; that which consumed in Messrs. Bals Brothers' premises, at the foot of London-bridge; that which destroyed the patent Kamptulicon works in the Commercial-road; at the one which was attended with so much loss of property in New-square, Lincoln's-inn; that which burned down the Olympic Theatre, and injured so many houses; the fire at the Railway-wharf at Bow Creek; and another which destroyed an oil and colour warehouse, and damaged nearly a dozen of houses in Great Suffolk-street, Southwark. The number of premises in which the fires were extinguished, with only slight damage, amounted to 1549, and the total number of fires for the year, 838; during the year 1848, the total number of fires were 809, showing an increase for 1849 of 33. The number of fatal fires for 1849 was 11, and the number of lives lost thereat amounted to 20. During 1849 the engines and firemen had been called out to 89 alarms from chimneys being on fire; and during the same period they had been called out 76 times to false alarms; making a total of false alarms for the year of 165. The number of fires in churches were only seven, and 205 false alarms, being an increase over 1849 of 41. The total number of fires and false alarms for the year was 1003, whilst for the preceding year (1848) the number was 1011, being 8 more than last year.

ACCIDENTS AT BUILDINGS CONSIDERING.—On Thursday evening, just as the men employed in the erection of the model lodging-house for families, in George-street, Bloomsbury, were about to leave work, an upper arch of the building, which is four stories high, gave way, and also the whole of the lower arches, and burying in the ruins three unfortunate men who were working in a lower apartment. On being extricated from their perilous position, they were conveyed to the Middlesex Hospital, several

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—For the week ending Saturday last, the births registered were 1383: males, 683; females, 700. Deaths, 1156: males, 545; females, 610. The average of deaths for ten corresponding weeks of previous years (1840-9) is 1125, which, if a correction of population for increase of population, becomes 1927. The lowest number in the ten weeks was 916 in 1840; the highest was 1401, in 1848. Though the rate of mortality has much increased since December, and the present return shows an increase of nearly a hundred on the previous week, the deaths are still less than the average by 71. To the coldness of the weather may be chiefly ascribed the increase of mortality which, however, returns have exhibited. In the last three weeks the deaths from bronchitis, or consumption, have been respectively 129, 140, and 157 (the corrected average for last week being 146); from bronchitis, 103, 120, and 131 (the average being 73); from asthma, 19, 35, and 27 (the average being 29); and from pneumonia, 53, 83, and 85, while the average is 117. Of the 85 persons comparatively few who died last week from pneumonia, 60 were children; but of the 131 who died from bronchitis, which much exceeds the average, by far the larger proportion were persons of advanced age. Seven men and 14 women died last week at 80 years of age and upwards; one of the latter, in Bishopsgate workhouse, had reached the age of 99. Epidemic diseases continue to be less fatal than usual, except measles, which carried off 37 children, principally under five years. This disease ranged in the corresponding weeks of ten previous years from 8 to 51. Only 10 deaths occurred from diarrhœa; and no deaths are ascribed to cholera in the returns of the 16 persons who had cholera in August, and never wholly recovered from the effects of it, died in St. Thomas's Hospital, where he had been for nine weeks. During the last seven weeks only two deaths from cholera have appeared in the bills of mortality.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—The mean daily reading of the barometer at the Greenwich Observatory was 29 574 in The mean daily temperature ranged from 25·5 degrees on Tuesday to 40 6 degrees on Saturday. The mean of the week was 31·1 degrees, which is 5·9 degrees less than the average of the same week in seven years. On Tuesday the mean temperature was nearly 14 degrees less than the average.

FROM "THE STANDARD" OF TUESDAY, JAN. 22.—The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of Saturday presents a beautiful sketch of the monument in the course of being erected in the town of Mansfield to the memory of the lamented Lord George Bentinck. The sketch is, indeed, like all the woodcutting of the journal in which it appears, beautiful and accurate, and as that journal is before us, let us, in the discharge of a common debt, bear testimony to the good spirit in which it is conducted as well as to the excellence of its display of art. The number which contains the Bentinck testimonial furnishes a view of the rising Protestant Church of Alexandria, and a picture of the good Queen Adelaide's Church at Malta: these are things to make an Englishman's bosom swell. We have a church in the Holy City, there represented, by the way, in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS; another in Alexandria rising, and a church in Malta. Scarcely less interesting is the sketch and notice of the Greek Church lately opened in Moscow, which will be found in the Journal of that week. LONDON NEWS of the 12th. A church erected on the once, to Greeks, unknown soil of Britain, by the descendants of those Athenians to whom, 1800 years ago, was preached "the unknown God," for whose worship this temple was raised. We did not intend to say so much of our ornamental and ornamented contemporary, but we have almost without design been led, by a grateful sense of its usefulness, to say so much of the "public instructors," whose teaching is most faultless, and certainly not calculated to be least effectual.

What will a child learn earlier than a song?

Pope asks. We answer, a picture. Viewed in this light, such a journal as that of which we speak is a great public benefaction. Wherever it goes, it must do good—more good as it professes less. It is an attractive school for the young—aye, and for the old too.

It is delightful to see the arts so well employed.

DEATH OF THE WIDOW OF DR. CHALMERS.—From Scotland, we regret to learn that this amiable lady, the relict of the Rev. Dr. Chalmers, expired on Tuesday last, thus surviving her distinguished husband but about two years. Seven daughters, two of whom are married, survive their excellent parent

In the New Forest the wages of the day men have been reduced from 12s. to 10s. per week; the old day men from 13s. to 6s. per week; and the old men, who made up faggots (ask at 3s. 6d. per hundred, and pine at 2s. 6d per hundred), are all thrown out of work. By this economy 66,000 acres of land are expected to pay their expenses. It is further proposed to reduce the number of groom keepers from 15 to 12, and the three last vacancies have not been filled.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE ROYAL THEATRICALS.—In consequence of the death of Mrs. Barclay, the Queen has graciously excused Mr. Barclay from appearing in the forthcoming dramatic performances at Windsor Castle. Her Majesty had previously commanded the representation of "Henry IV." with the view of witnessing Mr. Barclay's representation of Sir John Falstaff. That play, in compliance with her Majesty's express wish, will not now be performed; but "Charles XII." and the Hen. Edmund Phipps' translation of "King René's Daughter" will be represented in its stead. The performances will take place on Friday next, Feb. 1, and the following Friday.

NATIONAL EXHIBITION OF THE INDUSTRY OF ALL NATIONS, 1851.—Yesterday a very numerous meeting of the citizens of London was held in the Egyptian Hall, Mansion House—the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor presiding—which having been addressed by Lord John Russell, Mr. Labouchere, Mr Raikes Curry, Mr. Jones Lloyd, and other gentlemen of en minence in the City resolutions were passed, pledging the parties present to support the proposed exhibition, and enter into subscriptions for the purpose, upwards of £10,000 being announced in the room.

EAST INDIA COMPANY.—A special meeting of this company was held yesterday (Friday), Sir A. Galloway in the chair, when it was resolved that copies of the papers relative to the engagements entered into with the Emperor of Delhi, in 1803 and 1804, with all subsequent correspondence on the subject, should be laid on the table, and the same general meeting be made special for the purpose of taking them into consideration

SOUTH ESSEX.—Mr. J. Laurie, of Hyde Park-place, and Marshalls, Essex, formerly Sheriff of London and Middlesex, has announced that he will offer himself as a candidate for the representation of this division of the county, at the next vacancy, upon Conservative principles.

MERCHANT TAILORS' SCHOOL.—The Rev. J. A. L. Airey, M.A., of Pembroke College, Cambridge, has been unanimously elected Mathematical Master of Merchant Tailors' School. Mr. Airey's position, as Second Wrangler in 1846, is a sufficient indication of his high qualification for the office.

PROTECTIONIST MEETING IN KENT.—Penenden-heath—famous in days gone by as the scene of many meetings which have had no small influence on the destinies of this country, and connected with at least one great ovation—beheld on Thursday a large assemblage of the freeholders and inhabitants of the county of Kent and of the tenantry of Mad-tone, assembled by the High Sheriff, to take into consideration the present condition of agriculture, and the measures to be adopted for speedy and effectual relief. Notwithstanding heavy roads, bitter cold winds, and a sky charged with sleet and rain, large bodies of men continued all the morning to throng to the heath from the vicinity and even the remoter parts of Kent; farmers' carts, mounted squires, travelling chariots following in quick succession, with an amalgam of pedestrians and "free-traders" from the neighbouring town, till about 4000 people collected within and around the tent, the possession of which was eagerly contested, but it soon was evident that the Free-Traders occupied the main body in the centre, while the sides, benches, and the platform were appropriated by the Protectionists. The High Sheriff (Mr W. M Smith) opened the proceedings with a few remarks on the necessity of maintaining inviolate the Acts of Parliament, and then called on Mr. Hodges to address the meeting in favour of a resolution advocating Protection, amid great uproar. Mr. Hodges, M.P., expressed his opinion, that, having passed a law to remove all taxes on human food, they were bound to give that law a fair trial; and thanked the High Sheriff for having convened the meeting: it enabled him (Mr. Hodges) to say this—that a recurrence to Protection might as soon be expected as that the sun should rise in the west, or upon its course, Cheese, and cannon-balls. The tenants and landlords would, no doubt, mutually adjust their interests. A Free-Trade amendment having been moved and seconded, the amendment and resolution were put by the High Sheriff. The great body of the people in front of the platform held up their hands for the amendment, as well as several sweeps' brooms and brushes, a few sticks, and other exponents of popular feeling. The platform and seats under the tent displayed a strong muster of hands against it. The resolution was received in a similar manner. The High Sheriff then said: "I am of opinion that the original motion is carried." (Tremendous cheering from the Protectionists, mingled with loud groans from the Free-traders.) The High Sheriff shortly afterwards declared the meeting dissolved.

A grand review of the Dublin garrison took place on Thursday, in the Phœnix Park, before the Lord Lieutenant and Lady Clarendon, and a large concourse of men, so as to afford an unfailing supply of the popular ammunition.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE

The accounts from Paris (yesterday) mention that repeated deliberations had been held by Ministers during the two preceding days, upon despatches which had been received from General Baraguay d'Hilliers at Rome. It was reported that the gallant officer recommended that the French troops should immediately be ordered home, as the Pope felt averse to return to his Palace while they remained, as their presence was extremely disagreeable to other Powers.

ENCUMBERED ESTATES COMMISSION.—The business of this commission augments at a rapid rate. A new list of petitions for sales, thirty-two in number, was presented between the 7th and the 15th inst. A considerable portion of these petitions affect estates in the western provinces. There are three petitions in the case of Lord Oranmore, and the petitioners are relatives of the noble Lord, namely, the Hon. Mary Anne Browne, the Hon. Georgina Dorcas Browne (his Lordship's sisters), and the Rev J. G. Browne.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The association met on Monday at Conciliation Hall. The attendance was very scanty. Mr. John O'Connell brought forward a petition in favour of tenant-right, which was adopted The honourable gentleman then referred to the Queen's Colleges, and called upon Sir R. Kane to retract some expressions he made use of at the opening of Cork in reference to the system of education adopted in Belgium. Mr. O'Connell having referred to the late Protectionist meeting at the Rotundo, which he designated "a great Conservative demonstration," called on the Irish Repeal members to be watchful during the coming session on the franchise, Poor-law, and Church question. The rent was £11 7s. 3d.

THE O'CONNELL FAMILY.—The following summary, correct, but of very bad taste, in its statements, of the progress and position of the family of the late Mr. O'Connell, appeared in the Dublin Evening Mail; and however accurate its facts, its purport demonstrates beyond doubt that O'Connell was not a placeman or pensioner. "Long ago when the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel were said to boast of his parliamentary progeny; and, as he counted heads, while they filed before him into the lobby upon a division, to exclaim, 'There are eight of them on the one side, and only seven on the other.' But years have made an awful scattering of the race since then. The present House of Commons contains only three of them—Maurice, John, and Morgan John, not one of whom, according to present appearances, is likely to form a part of any future parliament. Morgan John, the honourable member for Kerry, has been posted by the Commissioners for the sale of Incumbered Estates, as about to be sold up, among the other victims of Free Trade and the Poor-Law. John, of Lincoln's-inn, is to be (in earnest), will soon retire into a private station. And the Kerry Evening Post now announces that the present occupant of the Abbey, Maurice, the eldest and last, is about to resign his Parliamentary seat. A poor whelp he never loved, and to serve but a generation as an alderman and a country gentleman. Where we consider the high position which Daniel O'Connell occupied for a long time in the political world, and remember the worship which he received from the people, the rapid progress of the family from affluence to debt is often saved from the displeasure of an indignant nation. It appears surprising how little has been done for his family. There are members of his tall, creatures who would never have been heard of beyond the limits of the agitation which they nursed their genius, now revelling in appointments richer than all the offices which have been bestowed upon his household. His son-in-law, Fitzsimon, has a place of unfailed emolument; another son-in-law, French, was made a stipendiary magistrate, and transported to Connemara, where he died; and his son Morgan holds an office worth about £1200 a year, where no gives constant attendance and good service for his pay. Such, we believe, is the total sum of profits enjoyed by the O'Connell family for all the lifts they have given the Whigs. It is no wonder their 'last rose,' feeling uncomfortable at being 'alone in its glory,' should fold itself up in its mantle and depart from a soil so uncongenial and ungrateful. We advise the hon. and learned member for Limerick not to refuse the ten thousand pounds. It seems to be his last chance. The Whigs won't do anything for him his opportunity is gone by; therefore his only chance is between the Bar and the Bog—and he has but to throw a guinea into that melancholy and multitudinous tread-mill, the hall of the Four Courts, to see that if he must tramp it for his bread, it is best to begin where he will have the whole walk to himself.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.—The presidency of the Irish College at Rome, vacated by the appointment of the Rev. Dr. Cullen to the Roman Catholic Primacy, has been conferred on the Rev. Dr. Kirby, who has filled the office of Vice-President in the college for many years, and the Very Rev. Dr. Miley, of Dublin, a gentleman distinguished in the literary world, has just been appointed President of the Irish College at Paris, in the room of Dr. M'Sweeney, retired on a pension. Both of these appointments are of great importance in the Irish Roman Catholic Church.

FREE TRADE.—An aggregate meeting of the citizens of Dublin, convened for the purpose of taking into consideration the best means of promoting and sustaining the principles of Free-trade, has been definitively appointed to be held in the Rotundo, on Monday next. It is convened as an "open meeting," to facilitate the attendance of the public on the all important subject of free discussion to the "private meeting of the landed gentry" for the protection at demonstration is termed.

SKATING IN THE REGENT'S-PARK.

CURLING MATCH

BETWEEN THE EARL OF MANSFIELD AND EARL OF EGLINTON, FOR £50 A SIDE.

This match came off on Wednesday, the 16th instant, on Airthrie Loch, near Bridge-of-Allan. From the depth of snow in the north, it was doubtful whether Lord Mansfield could come up; but he, with his party, arrived a little before one o'clock, having travelled from Perth by Central Railway, with no less than four engines to two carriages. Their Lordships, immediately on arriving, commenced to clear a rink—no easy matter, there being about eight inches of snow on the ice; this, by the united efforts of the party, was swept in less than half an hour; and, the toss having been won by Lord Mansfield, the winning game commenced at 20 minutes past one. The sides were as follows:—

1. Capt. James Drummond	agst	—— Fairley, Esq.
2. Earl of Mansfield	——	Earl of Eglinton.
3. Sir Thomas Moncrieff	——	J. D. Ferguson, Esq.
4. Master of Strathallan	——	Sir James Boswell.

The north party scored three the first lead; and having thus taken the lead, they kept it all through the game. The playing was very fine on both sides; and at twenty minutes past four, the numbers were 26 to 19, Lord Mansfield being the winner by seven shots. At the commencement of the play, Lord Eglinton proposed a bet of a load of meal for each of their respective parishes, which was accepted. The whole of the gentlemen played with great spirit and interest, and the playing was considered above the average of matches.

Another game, between the Bridge-of-Allan and Blair Clubs, sixteen a side, took place not fifty yards from where their Lordships were at work; but such is the all-engrossing attention of keen curlers each to his own rink, that little or no attention was paid to the arrival of their august neighbours, who cleared their own rink like jolly brothers, and set to. The clubs had a tough battle, the score being 74 to 70.

Lord Abercromby (on whose property the lake is) visited the ground several times during the day, and also sent refreshment. At the close, he presented the Bridge-of-Allan Club with a medal, and his Lordship also intimated that they were always welcome to play on the lake.

The annexed is a Sketch of the lake, showing the position of the players &c.; the left-hand rink being that of their Lordships.

SKATING IN THE REGENT'S-PARK.

On Sunday, the frost returned with increased intensity: the ornamental waters in the Parks were again firmly frozen, and throughout the day thronged with thousands of persons. In the enclosure, St. James's-park, the greatest numbers assembled, and between two and three o'clock no fewer than 12,000 were ascertained to have passed through the different entrances by persons stationed for that purpose. The Round Pond and Long Water, Kensington-gardens, had an equal number of visitants. The Serpentine was also crowded with skaters and sliders, as also the ornamental water in the Regent's-park. No accidents occurred, beyond a few cases of partial immersion.

Our Artist has sketched that portion of the lake in the Regent's-park immediately adjoining the Island, opposite Sussex-place. The scene here was extremely animated; the skaters were very numerous, and their execution of circles and figures was much admired.

THE TAMBOURINE GIRL OF PROCIDA.—PAINTED BY LEOPOLD ROBERT.

My Procida*, my native isle,
Mine emerald in a golden deep;
My garden where the roses smile,
My vineyard where the tendrils creep.
How sweetly glide the summer hours,
When twilight shows her silver sheen;
And youths and maids from all the bowers
Come forth to play the Tambourine.

At morn the fisher spreads his sail
Upon our calm encircling sea;
The farmer labours in the vale,
Or tends his vine and orange tree.
But soon as lingering sunset throws
O'er woods and fields a deeper green,
And all the west in crimson glows,
They gather to the Tambourine.

We love our merry native song,
Our moss-grown seats in lonely nooks,
Our moonlight walks the beach along,
For interchange of words and looks.
When toil is done, and day is spent,
Sweet is the dance with song between;
The jest for harmless pleasure meant,
And tinkle of the Tambourine.

My Procida, my isle of peace—
My father's home, my mother's grave—
May evermore thy joys increase,
And plenty o'er thy corn-fields wave!
May storms ne'er vex thine ocean surf,
Nor war pollute thy valleys green;
Nor fail the dance upon thy turf,
Nor music of the Tambourine!

CHAPTER IX.

FROM what took place on the morrow, it seemed as if the butterman had been working like yeast, for the whole neighbourhood seemed in a ferment. Knock after knock came to the door as fast as on Boxing-day; and Mrs. Nicholls, on looking out of her bed-room window, saw a small knot of creditors standing at the corner of the street, evidently discussing the important question of her husband's solvency.

This was the most trying time Mr. Nicholls had ever had to contend with. He had no heart for the business. To add to his misery, too, he had that morning had a few words with Mrs. Nicholls. He had insisted upon her seeing the tradesmen when they called, saying that it was part of the housekeeping business. But the lady had declared she was far too unwell for such a trial; adding, that it struck her as being highly indecent for a lady to interfere at all with a pack of men; and, indeed, she had spoken so freely on the subject, that Nicholls had been forced to order her to her bed-room—a request the lady had complied with without a murmur.

But the days of Nicholls's fashionable life were not yet numbered. His good fortune once more reprieved him from the disgrace of being obliged to confess himself a poorer man than he professed to be. The fact was, Mr. Nicholls had wasted all the morning in endeavouring to find out some excuse that should, at the same time that it added to his glory, add to his credit also. But, despite the brandy he had put in his tea, and the hour and a half he had lolled away on the sofa, he could think of nothing in any way suited to the purpose.

He was in this state when the first knock was shown into the room; and so taken by surprise was he when half a yard of butcher's bill was handed to him, that, scarce knowing what he was saying, Nicholls, for the first time in his life, truthfully explained the situation in which he stood. "In a fortnight's time," he added, "I expect a large sum of money to be paid into my banker's, and then I shall have much pleasure in discharging not only your bill but every one I may owe in the neighbourhood."

"He saw Parker enter with the waiter piled up with letter-looking bills."

To his surprise, the man seemed perfectly satisfied with this answer and took his leave with so many apologies, that Nicholls, in his delight even condescended to escort him to the door.

Mrs. Nicholls, as she heard the street-door slam, had another peep from her window. She saw the man that had left, join the group at the lamp-post; then followed another consultation; and, finally, the whole party, with drawn bills, advanced to the house. Mrs. Nicholls flew to the smelling-bottle. Her husband, too, gave a slight start as he heard the second knock that was to summon him to happiness or the Palace Court. When he saw Parker enter with the waiter piled up with letter-looking bills, he thought he should have fallen to the ground; but when the boy added that the gentlemen had all gone, and would call again in a fortnight's time, Nicholls's peace and colour returned, and he flew up-stairs to Sara, to tell what a glorious victory he single-handed had gained over their much-dreaded enemies, who, armed with the full powers of the law, had come to storm him in his castle.

"There, didn't I tell you you would be able to do it much better than I should, you dear clever fellow? Ah, you were made for a barrister, you rogue; you can persuade one to do anything, you can," cried Sara, as she kissed him.

"Yes, you are always right, my poppet," answered Nicholls, with a momentary pang at having let the woolsack slip through his idle fingers.

If the happy pair could have forgotten the jeweller, they would have been without a care. But those diamonds of the first water kept weighing on their minds with an hydraulic pressure that seemed likely to break the peace from them for ever. Mrs. Nicholls had already discovered three grey hairs; and Mr. Nicholls's waistcoats were so loose that he could comfortably bear them buttoned after dinner.

When the great settling-day came to hand, Mr. Nicholls, with the parental quarterly cheque duly changed into sovereigns, sat in state with his desk before him, in all the importance of a man who was ready to fulfil his promise to pay. As each tradesman was shown in, the amount of his bill, neatly folded up in paper of the purest couleur de rose was handed to him, and directly the receipt was signed he was dismissed with a glass of wine, an a neat speech, calculated to remove all ill feeling that existed between them and quiet all Mr. Nicholls's fears at to "all further favours being properly attended to"—a point on which his happiness and his dinners mainly depended for the next three months to come.

No sooner was this important business settled, than Nicholls, cramming the remainder of the notes and money into his pocket, hurried to Lincoln's Inn with all the speed of a one-horse power cab, to see whether he could not come to some arrangement in the case of Soane v. Nicholls.

It was then that Mr. Nicholls, for the first time, felt how expensive a luxury law was, and he could not help passing several very severe remarks—to himself—upon the great roguery of attorneys in general, and law-makers in particular. At first he had felt certain that he would be able to make almost any arrangement he liked; every one was so civil, and he was ushered from one room to another in a way quite gratifying to a defendant's feelings. Presently he was left alone with a stout gentleman, all in plain black and white, like an act of Parliament, who bowed and smiled so condescendingly, that Nicholls, gaining courage, talked boldly of the settlement he was so anxious to make.

At the magic word "settlement," a bill of costs, too thick to appear like a dream, was popped into Nicholls' hands. As he turned over the pages and read a few of the "To attending defendant on further postponement," he saw with horror that the days' upon days' delay he had obtained had cost him as dearly as if they had been golden days. To complete his misery, too, all the offers he made to arrange were refused; Messrs. Soane (no doubt, remembering their promise at the pawnbroker's) being determined that nothing under debt and costs should wipe out all differences between them.

"I would give sixty pounds now, and the remainder in three months," said Nicholls, with a supplicating look.

"Debt, one hundred and twenty; costs, thirty-eight pounds, you see," answered the lawyer, smiling, as he drew up his shoulders.

So Nicholls jumped into his cab again, and, tired of the world, went home to let the partner of his joys and sorrows have her full share of his misery.

In his affliction, the young barrister—not knowing what on earth to do—resolved to reform, to be prudent, and to save. For about the one hundredth time, he swore to tear himself away from Almack's and Kensington Gardens for ever. He would change his name, live in some desirable residence, delightfully situated, a hundred miles from Lincoln's Inn; and there, with his wife and little ones around him, live the prudent and inexpensive life of a hermit, until the savings would enable him to abuse that jeweller to his heart's content. But, like old Father Adam, he was doomed to lose the paradise he had dwelt in for the last ten minutes, through the folly of his wife—but with this difference: Eve used an apple; Mrs. Nicholls a "hop." Quadrilles at nine.

As Sara told him, that time for their party had come round, and all she wished to know was, were they to give one that year or not. She didn't want it. She would be only too glad to get out of it. Last year it made her ill for a month; in fact, it was no pleasure to her. Of course, Nicholls, after his meditations on retrenchment, was dreadfully opposed to anything of the kind.

"Very well, my dear," continued his wife, "of course you know best. Only, after that disgraceful scene in the open street the other day, it will look very strange if, all at once, we drop giving our party. People will talk, Wellesley, and it struck me that it would be an excellent opportunity of contradicting all the nasty reports that are abroad—especially as our credit is so good just now. Nobody loves economy more than I do, my love; but then persons shouldn't go to balls if they are not going to give balls in return, dearest."

For three days the husband withstood the constant attacks of his wife. Sara, however, nothing daunted, besieged him so closely, aimed her "ball" so truly, cut short the provisions so dexterously, and dealt out the destruction of their fashionable life so murderously, that at last Nicholls was forced to surrender, on condition that his ready money should be spared. So the day was fixed, scented paper bought, and in visitations sent.

Nobody to have seen the bustle and splendour that had suddenly broken out at the Nicholls's, would have for one moment imagined that they had ever known what it was to want a ten-pound note. Chandeliers, sofas, and ottomans were uncovered, carpets taken up and rout seats being taken in. The drawingroom redolent with geraniums and roses; the hall perfumed with jellies, custards, and pasties. Pastrycooks dittoed in and out of the passage, and there wasn't a house on the terrace that didn't know there was going to be a party at No. 5.

One morning, when Mr. and Mrs. Nicholls were deep in a consultation as to whether they should have a cornet-à-piston on the important evening, a young gentleman from Lincoln's Inn begged to be allowed to say a few words in that case of Soane v. Nicholls. It was merely to serve a notice of trial on the defendant, and to state that the cause stood second on the list for the morrow.

Nicholls was so knocked down by this heavy blow, that Sara became quite alarmed. If he had raved, and stamped, and sworn, she would not have cared so much; but to see him sitting all day long in his armchair, without speaking a single word or eating a single thing, nearly drove her mad. Half a dozen times she tried to rouse him, and failed. She had brought him jellies, and he had refused them. In fact, Wellesley was quite heart-broken. He knew he had no chance in court—that it would even be madness to defend—and that in less than a week his very bed might be taken from him, to pay for those "precious stones" that had so completely paved his road to ruin.

On the morrow—the day of trial—he never stirred from home. He could almost tell the moment when his case came on; and so great was his curiosity at one time to hear what was said, that, unable to resist the temptation, he had dressed himself to go out; but when the time for starting came, the fear lest his pawning the diamonds should be exposed kept him within doors. Half stupified with his grief, he moped away the whole day, thinking to himself how long it would be before the furniture it had taken him so much pains to get together would be sold, and he and all his family be turned, perhaps at a moment's warning, into the streets.

In this dilemma, the only chance of safety he could see was in his father. He thought that if Sara were to write to the old man, telling him faithfully all that had happened, and how bitterly he had suffered for his folly, perhaps he might be moved to pity, and lend him the means of turning aside the dreadful results of his extravagance.

So he had Sara into the room, and dictated to her the letter that was to restore or ruin him; and when it was finished, for fear that any accident should take place, he himself posted it.

At breakfast next morning Nicholls sent out for all the morning papers, and made his wife look them over, to see if the dreaded exposure had taken place or not. He would have done it himself, but he was sick with fear, and his pale cheek and shaking hand told the agony he was suffering. So he sat shivering over the fire, listening to the rustling of the papers, and trying to read in the expression of his wife's face whether the world had been made acquainted with the diamond transaction or not.

"Make haste!" he said at last, almost savagely in his impatience.

"I can't see anything in either the Times or the Chronicle," answered his wife, sharply.

"Thank God!" cried Nicholls, gaining fresh strength as his hope returned. "Look in the other."

"Nothing here either," was the reply; and the last paper is taken up. "Here is something," she said at last, in a tone that made her husband madly snatch the sheet from her hand.

But in another moment he jerked the paper from him, and as he almost shrieked for joy, cried, "Heaven be praised that I didn't defend! If I had only thought for one moment, there could be no evidence if there was no defence. I may be able to manage it all yet, and I will too, if I have to rob for the money."

All their hopes now were centered in the answer Sir Giles would send them. Nicholls went into a calculation to see the shortest time by which a reply could possibly reach them. He proved very clearly to Sara that the old gentleman was certain to send them the money, and had even arranged the short speech expressive of his feeling of disgust that he would oblige the Messrs. Soane with when he discharged their debt. All fear had vanished, and a hint at a disappointment would have been laughed down, like Dr. Dee's great London earthquake prophecy.

Had Nicholls been an Encke, he could not have foretold with greater precision the exact day when the post-office Mercury, in describing his circle, would come within the attraction of his street-knocker; for, at the moment specified, came the parental answer, and with it the complete destruction of the airy castles the unfortunate barrister had lately been revelling in. His father, instead of pitying, only abused him for his extravagance. He hoped it would be a good lesson to him; and even went so far as to say that, if his son couldn't manage to keep out of debt with £500 a year, he would see what he could do with just enough to prevent his going to the workhouse.

As if paralyzed by this fell blow, Nicholls lost all energy or wish to save himself. Shut up in his dressing-room, he waited quietly for the ruin and disgrace his creditors were preparing for him. Like a wretched criminal, he sat counting the minutes before the execution should take place. Sara, alarmed at the despair she saw in her husband's conduct, placed safely out of his look and key all his razors; and, fearful lest in his sorrow he should do some rash deed, she watched him narrowly, never even permitting him to leave his room unless she was by his side. Nor would she allow anything to be said or given to him that might in any way irritate him or add to his sufferings. All the law notices that came to the house she herself took and locked up, so that her husband might not be worried by them. But poor Mrs. Nicholls might have spared herself all this useless trouble. Her Wellesley was by far too fond of this world to think of leaving it before he was turned out. The very notion of a coroner's inquest, and a burial at midnight at cross roads, was sufficient to prevent him from injuring himself either by word or deed. Besides, there was the party coming off in a day or two, and a pretty thing it would be to have that bungling Parker telling the visitors as they came to the door, that "the party was put off 'cos master had killed hisself."

What surprised him more than anything else was the apparently extreme laxity of the victorious jeweller. Sara's zeal had kept from him all the law papers; and he, from not seeing them, imagined that his enemies, tired of conquest, were resting awhile upon their wrists. His doubts, however, were soon dispelled by the sudden appearance of a certain gentleman who, in the name of Sloman, demanded admittance for himself, and three shillings a day, and the use of the drawingroom for his follower, in so imperative a manner that Nicholls felt convinced it was useless resisting a man armed with the law, and standing six feet three in his bluchers.

Whilst Nicholls was yet talking to the men in the hall, the pastrycook, followed by two barley-sugar bird-cages and a pound-cake elephant, entered. In his alarm, lest the visitors should be recognised, Nicholls immediately hurried them into the parlour, where the table and sideboard were loaded with the plate, epergnes, and candelabra Nicholls had hired, to add to the supper-table effect. In an instant, one of the men, pulling out a small dirty memorandum-book, commenced making a list of the different articles; whilst the other, in a most impressive legal way, warned Nicholls of the penalties he would incur if a single article was removed from the house.

This more than Nicholls could endure. Calling to Sara, who was busy in the drawingroom, that she was wanted in the parlour, he seized his hat and hurried out of the house. He now determined that, come what might, he would relinquish his former vow of having nothing more to do with bills, and once more fly to the money-lenders for help. It was just two o'clock, the time when Lively Harry always went to the club to read the papers and get his letters. So Nicholls hurried down to him, and found him in his usual delightfully reckless state, wishing to oblige everybody; so that before two bottles of sherry and the last night's debate had been discussed, the bill was drawn, accepted, and safely stowed away in Nicholls's pocket-book.

But it seemed as if the whole tribe of Israel was aware of the dreadful state of the Nichollsonian finances. It was in vain he smiled and complimented, for, at the very mention of Lively Harry's name, they would decline, in the politest manner, having anything at all to do with that gentleman. Only once Nicholls had a chance, but then he must have taken one-half the amount in green cotton umbrellas—a thing that seemed to him to be providing too plentifully against a rainy day.

Nearly driven to his wit's end, it at last struck Nicholls that, perhaps, they would be better pleased if they saw the name of Reuben Marsh in place of Henry Chandos, so he hurried back to the office of the most moderate of his discounting capitalists—a gentleman who only wanted what was fair, and never charged more than five-and-twenty per cent.—and was delighted to find how just all his suppositions were. The name of Reuben Marsh was agreed upon; and Nicholls, bounding into the street, as light as a Jew's pound weight, hurried home for his carpetbag, that he might lose no time in getting down to Farnham.

Although the day was nearly gone, still Nicholls insisted on starting immediately. It was much better, thought he, to have this business settled at once, and get the worry and bother of it off his mind.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE change in the weather, although too recent to allow any of the events announced for this week to come off, leads us to expect that the fixtures for the ensuing one will lead to a full day's hunting, coursing, and steeple-chasing. Of the last-mentioned class of racing, only one meeting is advertised—the Lonth, for which a fair entry has been obtained. The coursing fraternity will be occupied on Monday with the Amicable and Newcastle meetings; on Tuesday with the Penrhyn (Wales); on Wednesday, at Middleham, Newcastle and Durham, and Howall; and on Thursday, the open Caledonian. All the hunting appointments are "weather permitting."

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A very strong muster of the operatives of the ring, and books brim-full of commissions, caused business this afternoon to be exceedingly animated, and the prices, in many instances, to undergo important changes. We may especially refer to the advance of Fugleman and Miss Ann for the Chester Cup, and Ghillie Callum for the Derby. The latter was, in reality, first favourite.

His gullet contained a fish of the salmon kind, measuring nearly two feet in length and 4 lb. in weight.

MUSIC.

THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

The programme at the 109th anniversary festival of this ancient society, founded by John Immyns, the lawyer, in 1741, at the Twelve Bells, in Bride-lane, was remarkably well selected. The first part began with T. Forde's psalm, "Almighty God" (1614); and the second opened with Palestrina's hymn, "I will give thanks:" the former a fine work—the latter positively sublime in gorgeous harmony and intensity of devotional feeling. The madrigals which were encored were W. Byrd's "While the bright sun" (1589), F. Pilkington's "Now peep—Bo-peep" (1590), Thos. Morley's "Fair Phillis I saw sitting all alone" (1595), J. Bennett's "When as I glance" (1599), J. Dowland's "Fine knacks for ladies (1600), and J. Wilbye's "Flora gave me fairest flowers" (1598). There were, also, in the second part, T. Weelkes's "In pride of May" (1608), G. Kirbye's "Sigh not, fond shepherd" (1580), T. Weelke's—Cold winter's ice" (1600), J. Ward's "Hope of my heart" (1613), and the customary finale, Saville's "Waits" (1667). There were thirteen cantos (boys of the Chapel Royal and Westminster Abbey), sixteen altos, twenty-four tenors, and thirty-two basses in the choir. The general execution of the music, conducted ably by Mr. King, was excellent—the light and shade of the ancient compositions were delicately observed. The festival was held in Freemasons' Hall, the lodge being graced by the presence of ladies, and the guests not taking a part in the performance occupying tables under the Sussex statue. The president of the Society, Lord Mardon, being prevented from attending by an attack of the gout, Major Oliphant took the chair. There were a so present General Sir Andrew Barnard, Sir John Campbell, Hon. G. O'Callaghan, Messrs. R. Grenfell, Bayley, Fitzherbert, J. Evans (President of the Worshipful Madrigal Society), Budd, Oliphant, Appleby, Bishop, Rea, Rendtorff, Robertson, Baumer, Rippingham, Colyer, Addison, Hogarth, Granelsen, &c. The members of the musical profession included Sir George Smart, Messrs. Cooper, Ellis, Lucas, Howell, Cipriani Potter, Turle, King, Lockey, Barnby, Elliott, Machin, J. Bennett, Land, Spencer, Benson, Goss, Brownsmith, Howe, Coward, &c. The grace, "Non nobis," was beautifully sung after the dinner, as may be expected from such a body of accomplished professors and amateurs. The toast list at these annual festivals in useless speeches; the loyal toasts and those connected with the society were given in rapid succession, generally with the musical honours—this is harmonized hurrahs. Mr. Oliphant, the hon. secretary, then delivered a speech full of point and epigram, when the toast of "The officers of the society" was proposed.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—The Choral Harmonists commenced their eighteenth season on Monday last, at the London Tavern. Beethoven's first Mass in C, and Weber's cantata, "The praise of Jehovah," formed the first part; and Morley's madrigal, "I follow to the footing," with overture and selection from Weber's "Der Freischutz," were included in the second part. Misses Birch and Dolby, Messrs. Lockey and Lawler, were the principal singers; and Mr. Dando was leader of the band.——Mr. Milne, with the Misses Smith and Mr. F. Smith, repeated their entertainment of Scottish songs, last Monday, at Crosby Hall.——On Tuesday evening, at the Marylebone Literary and Scientific Institution, a series of quartet and solo concerts, under the able direction of Mr. E. W. Thomas, was commenced, with Mr. Mori, Mr. Weslake, and Mr. Guest—all players in the Royal Italian Opera orchestra—as leaders. Miss Kate Loder is among the pianists. Mozart's Quartet in E flat, No. 4, Haydn's Quartet in E, No. 82, Beethoven's pianoforte, violin, and violoncello trio in B flat, No. 4, C. E. Horsley's Quartet in D, No. 2, Wallace's "Dracvienne," for the piano, and Mayseder's Danish air, with variations, for the violin, comprised a well-balanced selection compiled of all schools. The next concert will be on the 29th inst.——The fourteenth of the London Wednesday Concerts was given on the 23rd, at Exeter Hall. The vocalists were the Misses Lucombe, Poole, Eyles, Mrs. A. Newton, Messrs. Reeves, Land, Leffler, Harr Formes; the solo players were Thalberg, Ernst, and T. Harper (trumpet).——The Gentian Society held a meeting on Thursday.——On Friday the Sacred Harmonic Society performed, for the second time, Mendelssohn's oratorio, "St. Paul," conducted by Costa, with Miss Catherine Hayes and Miss Dolby, Messrs. Lockey, A. Novello, Smythson, and Harr Formes, for principal vocalists.——Ernst and Stephen Heller, the pianist and composer, will perform this day (Saturday) at a concert in Brighton, with Mademoiselle Grahman and Herr Formes as vocalists.——This evening, at the St. Martin's Hall, the Sacred Harmonic Choir announce a series of six chamber concerts, to be given every succeeding Saturday.——Mr. Willy's fifth classical chamber concert will be given next Monday, at the same place.——The Alcolist Club meet for the first time this season on Tuesday next, when evening M. Blilet will give his second séance musicale.——Halbry's "Val d'Andorra" will be produced in English, for the first time, next Monday, at the Princess' Theatre.——Ernst and Stephen Heller, the pianist and composer, will perform this day (Saturday) at a concert in Brighton, with Mademoiselle Grahman and Herr Formes as vocalists.——This evening, at the St. Martin's Hall, the Sacred Harmonic Choir announce a series of six chamber concerts, to be given every succeeding Saturday.——Mr. Willy's fifth classical chamber concert will be given next Monday, at the same place.——The Alcolist Club meet for the first time this season on Tuesday next, when evening M. Reeves and Whitworth, have been singing in English opera at Southampton and Brighton; and Mr. and Mrs. Donald King and Mr. Borrani at Liverpool.——The Royal Academy of Music terminated last Saturday its twenty-first season. Sontag will probably sing at Brussels in a few days.——The condition of Vivier and Beucdin, in the composition of an opera, will be an interesting event for the musical world.——The Western Madrigal Society had their fortnightly meeting last Saturday at the rooms in Lisle-street.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Conservatoire Concerts (Société des Concerts) have begun their season in Paris, under the direction of M. Gerard, the successor of the late Habeneck. Beethoven's Symphony in F was played: the andante was encored. Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" overture, and a solo of Baillot for the violin (an andante con sordini), executed by M. Alard, with the instrumental pieces. M. Massol sang a solo, with chorus, from Rossini's "Siege of Corinth," and Martini's romance, "Plaisir d'Amour," with the choral refrain soto voce.——Last Monday, Meyerbeer's "Prophète" entered its 45th representation, with Mdme. Viardot, at the Grand Opera, in Paris; on Wednesday she played (in Italian), at the same theatre, Rosina in "Il Barbière;" Duprez being the Count, Levasseur Basilio, Lablache Dr. Bartolo, and Rosconi Fiorello.——What a cast! The second and third acts of Rossini's "Otello," with Viardot and Dupres, and the third act of Rossini's "William Tell," with Duprez; the "Ecole des Maris" of Molière, played by the artistes of the Théâtre Français; Gerlo and St. Leon in the "Fleurs Animées;" and the bal from "Gustavus," terminated this extensive entertainment.——A new ballet for Carlo, "Nolla," and Auber's new grand opera, "L'Enfant Prodigue," are the positive rehearsal at the national Opera-House.——Madame Proger has made her début in Verdi's "Nabucco" (Abigail), at the Italian Opera-House in Paris; she has a fine voice.——Mademoiselle Arnaud, a pupil of Duprez, made her first appearance in the same opera.——Rouconi's Mahomet was sublime.——Meschine, Bo'dini, Mesdames Cruvelli, and Coleman and A. Dutta, the violoncellist, will pass the winter in Paris.——In the court-yard of the house in which Mozart was born, in Vienna, a marble statue of the composer will be erected, above a magnificent fountain, around the statue will be the busts of Gluck, Haydn, Beethoven, Rossini, Mendelssohn, and Meyerbeer.——A new opera called the "Avenger," by the chapel-master, Herr Schindelmeister, has been produced at Frankfort.——A success of esteem at Hamburgh.——Saint-Saële's "Bohemian Girl" continues its prosperous career at Frankfort.——The new opera-house at Pesth contains 3e private boxes, 300 stalls, and in all 2000 persons can be placed.——Signora Albertini (?), an English prima donna, is singing in Rome.

THE LATE MADAME GRASSINI.—One of the greatest singers of her time is no more. Madame Giuseppa (Josephine) Grassini, the glory of Italy, of the Consulate and Empire in France, of the King's Theatre in London, in 1805 and 1806, and the aunt of Giulia and Giuditta, died at Carlsta Grid the danseuse, expired recently in Milan. She was born at Varesa, in Lombardy, in 1775, and the beauty of her voice attracted the attention of General Belgiojoso, who had her educated for the stage. She made her début at the Scala, in 1794, singing with the tenors Lazzarini and Marchesi. Her success was prodigious; the beauty of her person, a lovely contralto organ, with elevated notes, great flexibility, and an expressive style, rendered her at once the star of Italy. She sang at Rome, Naples, and Venice, in Zingarelli's "Artaxerxes" and "Giulietta e Romeo," Portogallo's "Demophoonte," Paisiello's "Achille all Campsaye," Cimarosa's "Orazzi e Curazzi," &c. After the battle of Marengo, in 1800, Napoleon carried Grassini off to Paris, and made her sing at the grand national fête given in the Champ de Mars the 20th of July, 1800, at which 800 musicians were engaged. She subsequently visited Germany, and in 1803 succeeded Banti at the King's Theatre in London. In 1804 she was attached to the Opera in Paris at a salary of £6040, with a retiring pension of £6000; in London she had £3000 from March to July. She sang in Paris with Tacchinardi (father of Mesdames Persiani), Crescentini, Cravelli, Brizzi, &c. In 1805 she was singing with Mrs. Billington and Braham at the King's Theatre, and was included in the cast of Paer's "Camilla," when the first operatic work of the German master introduced in England. Grassini's great triumph in London was in Winter's "Il Ratto di Proserpina," in which Mrs. Billington was the Ceres. She returned here in the season 1814, but with impaired powers. For many years she lived retired in Paris, but returned to Italy after the Revolution of February. She took great pains with her niece, the Giulia, who always acknowledged the valuable advantages she derived from Grassini's instructions. The phrasing of this cantatrice, by all amateurs, is mentioned as unrivalled.

The Rev. Richard Edward Kerrich, M.A. (B.A. 1823), Christ's College, Cambridge, has presented to the Society of Antiquaries the cabinet of nearly 4000 Roman and other coins, the collection of his father, the late Rev. Thomas Kerrich, M.A. of Magdalene College, and Librarian of this University. Mr. Kerrich has also added to his father's collection of pictures, already in the possession of the society, a portrait on panel of Margaret of York, third wife of Charles of Burgundy.

Mr. Thomas Rendell, who steered the Victory during the battle of Trafalgar, on the 21st of October, 1805, in which Lord Nelson fell, is living on the Strand at Topsham (Devon), and has lately received a medal for that action. Lord Nelson's family had given him a medal shortly after the battle.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

The great dramatic event of the week was the appearance, on Monday, of Miss Vandenhoff and her father in Mr. S. Knowles's fine play of the "Hunchback." Making allowance for relative want of development, Miss Vandenhoff's Julia is a highly meritorious performance—one of considerable beauty, and full of artistic promise. Of Master Walter Mr. Vandenhoff is one of the most satisfactory representatives: in last night he was really great. We cannot commend Mr. C. Fisher's Sir Thomas Clifford; but, then, Mrs. Nisbett was glorious in Helen, and Mr. F. Vining, as usual, respectable in Modus. Altogether, the company at the theatre works better than was anticipated prior to its opening. It has prospered hitherto; a continuance of success, however, must depend on the production of novelty, and a minute attention to the mise en scène. To the last but little attention has been as yet paid. The house was well attended.

SADLER'S WELLS.

The first four acts of "Henry VIII." were performed on Monday, Miss Glyn supporting the part of Queen Katherine. This lady won great fame last season by her Siddonian impersonation of this majestic character. Her trial-scene in the second act is a rare example of powerful elocution and imperial bearing; while the dignity she sustains in the fourth, in its sickness, sorrow, dignity, and supernatural feeling, is one of the most perfect and impressive pieces of acting ever witnessed.

NEW STRAND.

The "Love Chase" has been performed here; Mrs. Glover being Widow Green, and Mrs. Stirling Neighbour Constance. Mr. Farren's Sir William Fondlove is excellent.

FRENCH PLAYS.—Thomas's new opera bouffon, "Le-Caïd," will be produced (for the first time in this country) at the St. James's Theatre on Monday next, in which Mdlle. Charton will sustain the title of Caïd.

At the MARYLEBONE Theatre a melodrama entitled "The Road of Life" has been played nightly during the week.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

MR. HUDSON AND THE YORK, NEWCASTLE, AND BERWICK COMPANY.

Mr. Hudson, the late chairman of this company, has published an address to his former constituents, the shareholders, in justification of his conduct. Mr. Hudson states, that while the negotiations were pending between the York and Newcastle and Berwick Company and the railway directors, he certainly did not expect that four years afterwards the disposal of those shares would be questioned or disputed on technical grounds. With regard to the shares in the Newcastle and Berwick Company, Mr. Hudson states that he made himself liable for them before the passing of the act of Parliament, by signing the subscription contract without detriment to other shareholders, and he believes that, had a loss occurred, he might have found been made responsible for it; and, therefore, he never incurred to him that in retaining the shares he ever incurred any moral or legal obligation to the company. With respect to the Sunderland Docks, Mr. Hudson next proceeds to say that, prior to his connexion with the town, he never had £2500 towards them on his private account, believing them to be absent al to the interests of the railway company, which he also induced to subscribe for 3000 shares. As the works proceeded, he felt that it was absolutely necessary, to increase the traffic of the railway, that the docks should be completed as soon as possible, and, therefore, 2345 additional shares were purchased for the company, and registered in the name of himself and two other directors —so that they could not themselves individually derive any direct or indirect benefit from the transaction. He admits that in this transaction the board exceeded their legal powers; but he refers to the fact that, had they acted strictly according to the rules with as little legal authority as the Sunderland Dock shares, which were taken with as little legal authority as the Sunderland Dock shares, has been ratified by the company, the only difference being that the retention of those shares is supposed to be likely to be beneficial to the York, Newcastle, and Berwick Company. Mr. Hudson next alludes to the supply of iron rails to the company, maintaining that he had a right to buy them at a low price, and that he did not charge the company a higher price for them, at the time of their purchase by the company, than they would have had to pay to other parties, or he could have obtained from other companies; and he also states that the transaction occurred before the passing of the act of Parliament vacating the seat of a director incurred in any contract with a company with which he was connected. Having made these explanations, Mr. Hudson says, that he feels it necessary to state why he has submitted to the payment of a sum of money to stay proceedings against him. He had strong opinions from eminent counsel that no claims could be legally substantiated against him; but he was informed that he might be involved in years of litigation, with enormous expense and endless annoyance and anxiety, and he therefore thought it better to agree to the arrangement which had been come to, and has consented to take upon himself the entire responsibility of the Sunderland Dock shares. Mr. Hudson next enters into an explanation of the manner in which the amounts have been expended or derived property applicable to the traffic accounts have been charged to capital, and points out errors in the accounts as published by the Committee of Investigation. His then expresses his conviction that the declension in the prices of the property is not so much to be attributed to the conduct pursued by himself or any other individual as to the course encouraged by the Legislature, of creating undue competing and branch lines, with diminished tolls, or no tolls, of unstinted power to call against which he exerted himself to the utmost, so long as he was able. The remedy for this state of things, Mr. Hudson hopes, will be found in the increasing trade and population of the country; in greater economy in the management of railways, as experience may suggest; and in the absence of fresh schemes for their extension. In conclusion, Mr. Hudson says, addressing the shareholders—"I am aware that transactions have occurred which are to be regretted, but in respect of which it is some consolation to me to reflect that the company have in no instance sustained pecuniary loss. Allow me to ask you to review these transactions with some remembrance of the exalted period in which they occurred—of the multiplicity of concerns which I had to superintend and direct—of the brief opportunities I had for reflection, and of the impossibility of my giving sufficient attention to the public duties and private matters which then claimed my attention," expressing at the same time his conviction of the soundness of the property, in which he still holds a large interest.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—The officers and employés of this company have just presented a testimonial to Mr. Doorley, the resident engineer of the line, consisting of his portrait, painted by Mr. W. H. Phillips, £500 worth of London and North-Western stock, at par, and a purse of gold—an elegant service of plate being at the same time presented to Mrs. Doorley. The subscription list, exceeding £1000, was raised from 700 subscribers. The portrait, which is an excellent likeness, has been ably engraved by Mr. T. L. Atkinson, under the superintendence of Messrs. Edgar Bros., of Regent-street Mall; and an impression of the plate is presented to each subscriber of £2 2s. and upwards to the testimonial fund.

SOUTH-WESTERN.—An elegant service of plate has just been presented by the workmen engaged on the line to Mr. Albuna Martin, the late acting engineer, as a testimony of respect for his character, and their regret at his retirement.

BRISTOL AND EXETER.—The directors have replied to the memorial of the shareholders, that resolutions have been passed at the board to the effect that no director shall either directly or indirectly supply any contractor with materials for the use of the company, and that the board would not, in the exercise of their power for supplying vacancies in the direction, elect any person engaged as a carrier on the line.

AMERICAN COMMERCE WITH ASIA BY THE PACIFIC.—A new era has at length dawned in the trade of Asia. We learn that, by the Empire City steamer, quite a cargo of tea, silks, and porcelain was received by Livingston, Wells, and Co., of New York, from China, via San Francisco, Panama, Chagres, &c., being the very first merchandise received in this country by way of the Pacific, and across the narrowest portion of the American continent. The probability is, that this is only the avant-courrier of our immense traffic. Already arrangements are in progress in New York to run a regular line of steamers for passengers and merchandise between San Francisco, China, and Asia, across the Pacific Ocean, and touching at the Sandwich or other islands. Now, as in ancient times, the ambition of commerce is India—still India! The same traffic that enriched ancient Egypt, Tyre, the Wilderness, Petra, Venice, Holland, and, immeasurably more than all, England—is that of India, still India! And at length we find it beginning to flow into the United States across the vast Pacific, through the golden gates of California. This commerce, inaugural and national channels about rights of way, will soon display its magic power, in the opening of two or three canals and Nicaragua, the Isthmus of Panama, or that of Tehuantepec—probably all of them within twenty years.—Philadelphia Correspondent of the Morning Chronicle.

MDLLE. JENNY LIND.—Mdlle. Lind has signed a contract with Mr. Phineas Barnum, of New York, for 150 concerts, to be given in the United States within twelve or eighteen months; for which Mdlle. Lind will receive from £16,000 to £30,000; nearly half of which sum is lodged as security with Messrs. Baring. The agreement was signed on January 9, at Lubeck, by Mdlle. Lind, who has given concerts there, and at Hamburg, for the benefit of the public charities. For the same noble purpose, Mdlle. Lind has promised the King of Sweden to give a concert at Stockholm previous to her departure, in August or September next, for the United States; prior to which, it is stated, Mdlle. Lind will sing at Liverpool, for the benefit of the "Sailors' Home," the opening of which is expected to be honoured by the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J W B—1. Your name ought certainly to have been inserted in the list of subscribers. 2. Chess is played much more and much better, on the average, now, than it was ten years back. 3 A report of the games in question will, probably, be made hereafter. They would form a very interesting lecture.

W K—We doubt the possibility of effecting mate in Problem No. 311 in the way you suggest. In reply to—1. Q to her 5th. Black may play—1. P takes K B Pawn. How then would you proceed?

P E—Your "Juvenile offering" is better than many veteran productions. It shall have an early place among our Enigmas DILICHON—There is some flaw in the last diagram of "Damocles." Will our Correspondent favour us with a corrected version?

H E K, York—They are both clever. One of them, however, we suspect, has been submitted to us before.

H F L—As an actual occurrence in play, the mate sent, in two moves, is very neat and satisfactory.

SELLAIT is thanked for his obliging and very acceptable communications

W F A. Dublin—In the situation forwarded, the Red King cannot move to his K 6th, because he would go into check of the Pawn.

BLUE JACKET, U. S. Club, is thanked; but, on his examining Problem No 312 again, he will find the men are rightly placed, and that the defence he proposes would enable White to mate neatly in one move less than the stipulated number

CRUSAS—White had an obvious purpose in checking with his Q at move 15, viz. to render his adversary a Castling on the Q side impossible

JOHN OF KENT—1. The King may move one square at a time, all over the board, in any direction. 2 "The Chess-Player's Handbook," published by Bohn

HIT RIT—The author's solution of the beautiful Problem No. 311 is perfectly correct, and yours unbeatable

J C W Ingenious, though in no respect difficult

R K—Your friend must play Chess by rules which no one else ever heard of. Why do you not procure some elementary work upon the game, and show him the absurdity of his propositions?

J P, Hythe—Black may take the K B's Pawn with Pawn, and escape

B B, Barnstaple—Very crowded and intelligent. Below a few weeks' study on the admirable models of problem composition which D'Orville has presented

H H—The games shall certainly appear. In the meanwhile, we shall be glad of those in the match mentioned

W F—No 308 is solved thus—1. Kt to K 6th (ch); 2. Kt to Q B 7th (ch); 3. B to K 8th; 4. B takes Kt (checkmate). No 304 you should try again

SIR G S—1. Taking the game from your diagram, it would appear that White may win by force if he play at once Q to K Kt 3d, as his adversary has then no possible means of preventing his capture of the K R Pawn, giving mate next move. If, however, we begin at a subsequent stage—for example, when the Black Queen recedes to her own square—we doubt if the line of play you have marked out could be improved. 2. We quite coincide with you in opinion as to Problem No. 312

A MEMBER OF THE Y C A, Yorkshire—The members of your Chess Society ought to find no difficulty in obtaining the "Staunton Chessman," without sending to London. Powell, of Leeds, we were told, always keeps a stock on hand: apply to him. By the way, has it yet been finally determined where the Yorkshire Chess Association will this year hold its annual meeting festival?

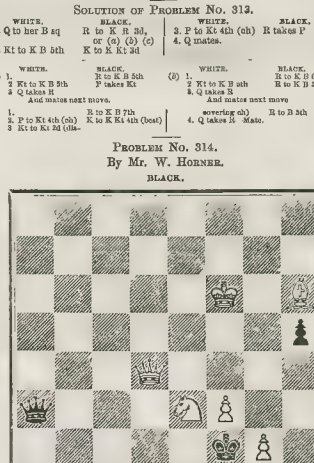
PROBLEM NO. 314.

By Mr. W. Horner.

BLACK.



WHITE.

White to play, and mate in five moves.

CHESS IN THE METROPOLIS.

Games in a Match just played between two rising Amateurs, Messrs. Brad and Hughes; the former giving the odds of the Pawn and two moves.

(Remove Black's K B Pawn from the board.)

WHITE (Mr. Hughes).	BLACK (H. E. Bird).	WHITE (Mr. Hughes).	BLACK (H. E. Bird).
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th	12. K B to Q 3d	K B to Q 3d

11. Q to B 2d	R to K sq (a)	22. K to K sq	Q to B 8th Mate

(a) Q Kt takes Kt, followed by K Kt to his 5th, would have gained Black an open attacking sort of position.

(b) To take the K Kt P with the Bishop looks inviting, but is not sound.

(c) Black's next move materially alters the appearance of things, and now we should think the taking the K Kt P a perfectly safe and very advantageous move for the first player. Assuredly much better than the move above.

(d) This is irresistible, let White play as he may, and gives a pretty finish to the game.

GREAT MATCH AT CHESS IN THE UNITED STATES, FOR ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

The amateurs of the Royal game will be gratified to learn that the preliminaries for a grand encounter between Mr. C. H. Stanley, the English player, who so distinguished himself in the celebrated contest at New Orleans in 1846, and Mr. J. H. T——, of Louisville, Kentucky, have been definitively settled. As far as we at present are informed, the terms agreed on are, that the match shall take place at Washington, and commence on the 11th of February. The winner of the first eleven games to be conqueror, and entitled to the stakes of 500 dollars on each side. To avoid the tedium so often complained of in what are called the close games, it is stipulated that both players on the first move shall open by advancing the K's Pawn to his K's 4th sq.

LAUNCH OF THE "EARL OF HARDWICKE," WHALING SHIP, AT COWES.

THE SOUTHERN WHALE-FISHERY COMPANY'S SHIP, "THE EARL OF HARDWICKE."

THE annexed Engraving represents the launch at Cowes, on the 16th inst., of a fine barque, measuring about 256 tons O. M., built for the Southern Whale-Fishery Company, by Messrs. Thomas and John White, the well-known ship-builders of the above-mentioned place. The ship has been named the Earl of Hardwicke, in compliment to the Governor of the Company; while another ship of a similar tonnage, built for the same Company by Messrs. W. Moore and Son, of Plymouth, and also just launched there, has been named the Sir James Ross. Both these vessels are being fitted with all despatch, and will be sent direct to the Company's station at Auckland Island, in order to prosecute the Whale Fishery from thence; in which pursuit they will have been preceded by the whaling-ships which the Company sent out in August last, conveying the preliminary expedition.

We understand that the Southern Whale-Fishery Company has other vessels in progress of construction, which will shortly be ready to follow in succession the Earl of Hardwicke and the Sir James Ross.

LOSS OF THE BRIG "VINE," OF BRISTOL, AT WHITBY.

AN exciting scene occurred at Whitby on Monday, the 14th inst., when the brig Vine, of Bristol, laden with oats, sprung a leak off the pier, and, either through ignorance of the time of high-water or a want of knowledge of the port he was about to enter, the master attempted to take the harbour about one o'clock P.M., the tide then being very little past ebb, when the vessel, as a matter of course, struck upon the sands, about 200 yards from the entrance to the harbour. The crew left the vessel by the life-boat, except the master, Captain John Honey, who, we understand, is part owner, who refused to leave the vessel. As the tide rose, the wind, which was blowing strong from the S.E., increased to a complete gale, and the sea ran very heavily, which soon stove in one side of the vessel and dismasted her. The master still stuck to the vessel, and the storm increased, the waves breaking over her most furiously. The piers were now crowded with anxious spectators, expecting every moment to see the brig dashed to pieces. Meanwhile, the life-boat had been manned and sent to the vessel three times, and endeavours made to persuade the master if he valued his life to leave the wreck, but in vain; he expressed his determination to "stick to her as long as a timber remained." But the breakers became so fearfully heavy, that, when the fourth time the boat went to the rescue (about five o'clock P.M.), he was glad to avail himself of the assistance; and, after four or five unsuccessful attempts to near the wreck, the master was got into the boat in an exhausted and almost lifeless state. On reaching the shore, another and unexpected peril awaited him. The crowd was so anxious to get a sight of a man who appeared to value life so little, that it was with the greatest difficulty he could be got to a house of refuge without injury, several persons being thrown down in the crowd and trampled on. Whilst this scene was enacting, another, of a more amusing character, was being performed up the harbour. The sea having washed out the greatest part of the cargo (oats) it drifted up the harbour with the tide, when the surface was literally covered with the grain, and dozens of boats were engaged skimming the water with baskets and other articles that would hold the grain and let off the water, so as to secure many a treat for the swine of the poor fishermen. It is said the vessel is uninsured; and one reason assigned for the extraordinary conduct of the master is, that he, being the principal owner, had got a crotchet in his head that if he left the wreck it would be claimed as a derelict.

THE LICENSE OF LIBERTY IN THE MODEL REPUBLIC.—The ruffianly gangs that infest the neighbourhood of Philadelphia have renewed their horrid and murderous outrages. On New Year's night a party of "rowdies" broke into a private house, and on being compelled to leave they nearly killed Mr. Hornkeith, the owner, with bowie-knives, and shot his son dead, in the presence of his outraged family. The desperadoes—quite a mob of them—forced an entrance into the dwelling after a festal supper, and insisted upon the family providing a meal for them, which could not be done. The result of this attempted enforcement of mob tyranny was bloodshed and barbarous murder. On the following Thursday night, some men, supposed to be a portion of the same gang, shot at the conductor of the Baltimore mail-cart, and nearly felled him with a bludgeon, their object being doubtless to murder him and rob the mail, on its way to the Baltimore and Philadelphia cars at Gray's Ferry, a passage and bridge over the Schuylkill, in the suburbs of Philadelphia.

CURIOSITIES.—XII.

THE BIBLE USED BY KING CHARLES I. ON THE SCAFFOLD, ON THE DAY OF HIS MARTYRDOM, JANUARY 30, 1648.

IN Smith's "Collectanea Antiqua" is a representation of the Bible traditionally said to have been used by Charles I. just previous to his death; and, as the relique is of great interest, we have copied the Engraving, and subjoin the description from the work referred to:—

"There is so much external evidence of the genuineness of this very beautiful and interesting relique, that no doubt can exist as to its perfect authenticity; though the circumstance of the King having a Bible with him on the scaffold, and presenting it to Dr. Juxon, is not mentioned in any contemporaneous account of his death. The only notice of such a volume, as a dying gift, appears to be that recorded by Sir Thomas Herbert, in his narrative, which forms a part of the 'Memoirs of the Last Two Years of the Reign of that unparalleled Prince, of ever-blessed memory, King Charles I.;' London, 1702; 8vo, p. 199; in the following passage:—'The King thereupon gave him his hand to kiss, having the day before been graciously pleased, under his Royal hand, to give him a certificate that the said Mr. Herbert was not imposed upon him, but by his Majesty made choice of to attend him in his bedchamber, and had served him with faithfulness and loyal affection. His Majesty also delivered him his Bible, in the margin whereof he had, with his own hand, written many annotations and quotations, and charged him to give it to the Prince so soon as he returned.' That this might be the book represented in the above Engraving, is rendered extremely probable, by admitting that the King would be naturally anxious that his son should possess that very copy of the Scriptures which had been provided for himself when he was Prince of Wales. It will be observed that the cover of the volume is decorated with the badge of the Principality within the Garter, surmounted by a Royal coronet in silver gilt, enclosed by an embroidered border: the initials C.P., apparently improperly altered to an R., and the badges of the Rose and Thistle upon a ground of blue velvet; and the book was, therefore, bound between the death of Prince Henry, in 1612, and the accession of Charles to the throne, in 1625, when such a coronet would be no longer used by him. If the Bible here represented were that referred to by Herbert, the circumstance of Bishop Juxon becoming the possessor of it might be accounted for by supposing that it was placed in his hands to be transmitted to Charles II., with the George of the Order of the Garter belonging to the late King, well known to have been given to that prelate upon the scaffold. This volume is in the possession of Robert Skene, Esq., of Rubislaw."

BRITISH ORPHAN ASYLUM, CLAPHAM RISE.—The annual meeting of the promoters of this charity took place on Monday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, for the purpose of receiving the report for the past year, and for the election of children; the Lord Mayor in the chair. The report stated that the directors desired to acknowledge, with heartfelt gratitude, the fact that during the prevalence of the cholera the children had been preserved from that fatal disease. This fact might be regarded as a proof of the sanitary regulations of the institution. On the 1st of Jan., 1849, there were 57 boys and 34 girls in the asylum. During the year 19 had been admitted, and 15 had left; so that on the 31st of December last there were 95 children in the institution. Since the last report there had been a considerable increase of accommodation, and various important arrangements had become necessary, in order to promote the greater healthiness of the institution. This had been accomplished at an outlay of £724 2s. 11d. At the annual dinner, which took place in the month of May last, £700 was collected, and a further sum of £157 6s. was raised by two sermons which had been preached in the course of the year. The directors deplored the loss of the "excellent and beloved Queen Dowager," who had been a donor to the institution to the amount of ten guineas annually. There were thirty-seven candidates at the present election, of whom eight were admitted. The financial statement showed that the receipts (including life subscriptions, &c.) amounted to £2602 13s. 5d., the expenditure to £2391 16s. 8d., leaving a balance of £211 1s. 9d. The report having been adopted, the names of the successful candidates were announced.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

ACCORDING to papers received from the Cape of Good Hope to the 15th of November, 1849, the "Anti-Convict Association" meetings continued to be held in the colony; and at them resolutions invariably were passed condemnatory of the conduct of the local Government, and the determination of Sir H. Smith, the Governor, to detain the convicts in Simon's Bay. The inhabitants of the outlying districts fully concurred in the policy of the anti-convict party at Cape Town.

The Cape Frontier Times says:—

"His Excellency's determination to keep the Neptune in the colonial waters until the Colonial Minister shall decide whether her 300 convicts shall be landed in the colony, or disposed of in some other way, is, in fact, breaking up society at the Cape, and disorganizing it in the country districts; and unless relief be at hand, the consequence may yet be disastrous.

"The continued suspension of all business transactions between the people and the Government, pending the final disposal of the Neptune's cargo, finds a full justification in the bad faith and tyrannical temper of the Colonial Minister. If the opposition of the colonists to the convict scheme had been manifested with less severity, this colony, within twenty-four hours after the arrival of the Neptune, would have been a penal colony, not merely on paper, but in reality and in fact; and if the opposition to the detention of the Neptune were less vigorous than it is, the probability of the eventual location of her convicts at the Cape would be immeasurably increased. Earl Grey will naturally and justly calculate the strength of the resistance which he would have to encounter: he ordered the convicts to be landed, according to the degree o opposition which the bare detention of the ship in Simon's Bay has excited; and having the fear of Parliament before his eyes, he will count the cost before, thus forewarned, he enters upon the contest."

An interesting testimonial of the gratitude of the colonists is about to be presented to a member of the House of Commons for the distinguished part he has taken in the question. This memorial is a handsome table centre-piece, of silver, manufactured by Mr. Smith, of Duke-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields. The design is very characteristic: the group consists of an oak, the emblem of resistance; below are figures of Justice, and a lamb; with a medallion of a ship in full sail. One side of the decorated base bears the following inscription:—

"Presented by the municipality of the city of Cape Town, in South Africa, to CHAS BOWYER ADDERLEY, ESQ., M.P., in testimony of their high estimation of the distinguished and generous services rendered by him in the Commons House of Parliament, on the 27th day of March, 1849, in advocating the cause of the Cape colonists against the measure projected by Government of introducing convicts into that settlement."

The plate, we understand, will be presented to Mr. Adderley next week.

PLATE FOR PRESENTATION TO C. B. ADDERLEY, ESQ., M.P., BY THE MUNICIPALITY OF CAPE TOWN.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON.—We have correspondence from Malta to the 12th of January. Latest accounts from the fleet left it under the orders of Sir W. Parker, Bart., G.C.B., lying at the island of Masconni. The gallant admiral was about to quit, in a day or two, for Salamis Bay. A melancholy and fatal accident has happened to Lieut. H. W. Dawson, of the Odin steam-frigate, late of the Thetis. He had been out shooting, and on returning had incautiously placed a loaded gun between his legs, when accidently touchi g the trigger the gun was discharged, and the contents were lodged in his heart, and he almost immediately expired.

A NEW SCREW STEAM CORVETTE.—The Admiralty have ordered Mr. Mare, of Blackwall, to construct for her Majesty's service a new screw corvette of 1300 tons, to be named the Hydyfyer. She is to be built of wood, and is to have engines of 240-horse power.

A NEW DESCRIPTION OF STEAM-VESSEL.—During last week great excitement prevailed at Marseilles by the arrival in that port of an entirely new description of steamer, and which, if successful, will cause a complete revolution in the present plans of building steam-vessels. The vessel is named the Port de Marseilles, and was built by M. Lieutenr. It has not the slightest appearance of masts or funnel; in fact, there is nothing to show whether she be propelled by wind, or steam, or oar. She glides through the water as if propelled by some invisible agency. The propelling power is by a simple lever of sufficient power.

DREADFUL WRECK AND LOSS OF LIFE.—A loss was made known on Wednesday at the War-office and Lloyd's, which created a deep sensation throughout those establishments. The calamity befell the Richard Dart, transport, Captain Porter, commander, which struck on a desolate reef of rocks in the Indian Ocean, while on her passage to New Zealand. The Richard Dart had on board a detachment of Sappers and Miners, with various articles of merchandise. The ship's company and passengers consisted of a crew of 10 or 15 men, 28 of the Royal Sappers and Miners, commanded by Lieutenant Liddel, Dr. and Mrs. Fitton, a child, Dr. Gale, Mr Kely, four women (wives of the soldiers), and nine children. After the ship struck, the next sea drove her over the reef. The rollers were terrifically high, and carried in the stern cabin windows, at the same time filling the beam and sweeping 47 of the passengers and crew into eternity. The survivors, after 42 days of intense suffering, at length fell in with some explorers on the island, in the service of Mr. Geary, of Cape Town, who generously shared their stock of food with them. They arrived at Table Bay on the 16th of November, when every attention was paid to their wants. Their names are- Mr. Samuel Porter, commander; John Mills, chief mate; Edward Pirnie, John Campbell, Richard Collins, Thomas Jenkins, and William Jones, seamen; James Read, Thomas Inglis, and Owen Devinoy, sappers and miners. The petty officers who went out with the detachment, and who are lost, were Sergeant-major Sutton and Corporal Bartholomew Griffiths. They had their wives and families on board.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

THE commencement of the season in which balls are given has filled the Parisian salons with charming and elegant toilettes. The ball-dresses are particularly light, and are nearly all made of tulle with several skirts, one over the other. Each skirt is trimmed with one or more rouleaux of satin, with ruches, or with chenille, gathered up at the side by a bouquet of flowers. The bodies continue pointed, but the points are less sharp; they are trimmed with folds of tulle, ornamented with ruches or chenille to match the trimming of the skirts. Bows of ribbon, with very short ends, are placed on the sleeves, which are made of puffings of tulle. A bouquet of the same flowers as those of the dress is fixed in the centre of the corsage. Dresses of crape, of silver gauze, and tulle embroidered in floss silk, are also very elegant.

There never was a time when silken materials were so rich and splendid as at present. Damas, with large waterings, makes magnificent evening dresses for married ladies; they are trimmed with old lace, or Honiton, and in the centre of the bows of ribbons which adorn the sides of the dress are placed diamonds or other gems. Lace berthes are always worn, both with these rich stuffs and velvet. For morning visits there is very little alteration in the make of the dresses: the bodies are still plain and high, and the skirts very full. As to the trimmings, the severity of the season leads ladies to give a preference to fur; and nothing is more comme il faut for the afternoon than a velvet dress trimmed with Zibelino sable. Furs are also employed as cloaks, but this is too unbecoming a fashion to be adopted by any person of taste; besides which, these cloaks are very heavy and inconvenient.

Bonnets retain their round and open form. Very pretty capotes are made of dark satin, the edge and curtain of which are trimmed with chenille, which is both simple and becoming.

Coiffures for dinners and concerts are dazzling to the eye, from the gold-embroidered gauze and gems of which they are composed. Turbans are much worn, and are fastened in the front by an aigrette of diamonds, or a jewelled flower. Jewels are more fashionable than ever: diamonds, rubies, emeralds, are apparently scattered over the dresses, for each bow of ribbon sparkles with a gem. Natural flowers have a decided advantage over artificial ones; and it is in very good taste to place in the hair one of those beautiful camellias, which retain their freshness even in the heat of a ball-room. Bouquets for the hand are made larger than ever: a toilette without a bouquet is hardly complete; and, to give the stamp of real elegance, it should be formed of the rarest flowers which the conservatory can produce.

GERMAN EMIGRATION.—A gentleman, a native of Germany, but at present resident in England, visited Hull a few days ago, for the purpose of making arrangements for the transport of many thousands of emigrants during the approaching spring and summer, who are intending to leave the kingdoms of Hanover, Wirtemburg, Bavaria, and Prussia, the Grand Duchy of Saxony, and other parts of Germany, to settle in the United States of North America, and elsewhere. A very large proportion of the intending emigrants purpose leaving the land of their birth on account of their inability there to find the means of adequate support, whilst others seek the change chiefly from the longing which they have for greater liberty than they can enjoy under their native rulers and old-established governments. Those Governments appear not insensible to the necessity of easing their respective countries of a portion of the population, for several of them have announced their intention to relinquish entirely the claim to the ten per cent. duty formerly levied upon all property which emigrants took out of their respective countries, and also to allow the voluntary exiles to pass for half fare over the Government railways. The King of Hanover and the Duke of Saxony are amongst the number. We understand that there are two companies who have undertaken to conduct this extensive emigration. Both proceed on pretty much of the same plan, bringing the ex-patriots from innumerable places scattered over the continent of Europe, forming them into a continued stream by the ordinary passage-boats on the Rhine, and by other conveyances by land and water, collecting them in Hamburgh as a centre, and there shipping them by the Hull steamers, in groups or companies of about 200 or upwards. The steamers will depart punctually on their appointed days, and usually make their passages with great regularity. Immediately on their arrival in Hull, they will be placed under the care of the agent of the emigration company, whose duty it will be to see that they are all comfortably attended to, and forwarded without delay by railway to Liverpool, where another agent of the company will be in readiness to receive them, and attend to the re-shipment of themselves and their luggage. One of the companies, we understand, confines its attention to emigration to the United States; the other has a wider range, including the states of South America and Australia. It was on behalf of the latter company that the visit we have alluded to was made to Hull; interviews were held with the proprietors of the respective steam-ships, and an arrangement entered into by which about 300 emigrants will be forwarded here in the first steamer from Hamburg on the breaking up of the ice.—Eastern Counties Herald.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has received from "A. B." £5, in payment of "a balance of unpaid assessed taxes due to Government." He has paid over the amount to the Receiver-General of Inland Revenue.

IMPROVED SKATES.

WE have been favoured by a Correspondent with the annexed design for an improvement in Skates, which has the advantage of ensuring firmness, without the uncomfortable pressure which attends the use of straps. The only object generally sought for in skates is, that they shall be firmly fastened to the boot; it being forgotten, at the same time, that, unless the boot be also secured to the foot, the skate might as well be loose upon the boot; whilst the ankle, which in figure skating is so severely taxed, is left altogether unsupported. The chief advantages, therefore, of this skate are, that both the skate and the boot are secured to the foot, and the ankle at the same time firmly sustained. The pressure of the fastenings is also distributed over a large surface, so as entirely to relieve the foot of cramp or uncomfortable feeling. The Engraving will sufficiently explain the fastening at the heel. The toe-piece is similar to those which have been in use some years. A provision is made in this skate for adjusting it to differently sized boots as it is screwed between a brass plate and the wood, and slits cut in the leather for the screws. It may, therefore, be drawn out or pushed beneath the plate until it fits the boot, and afterwards screwed tight. This arrangement being made, it will not require alteral on, as the skate may be put on without interfering with it. The fastening at the heel is secured to the wood by a similar plate; and the wood is cut down at the toe and heel to let the plates level with the other part. There is no spike or screw for the heel; but two or three pins are provided, similar to those in the toe of ordinary skates; and the wood of these is more the shape of the boot, being broader at the toe and instep. The skate, from being so easy, and not requiring the boots to be pierced, is particularly suitable for ladies.

THE DUTCH OR FEN SKATE.

For skating long distances, we recommend the use of the Fen, or Dutch skate. This form of patten is also decidedly preferable for learners. It is almost to be wondered that any one can learn with the bow-skate, which was originally only intended to cut figures on a small circle of ice. The iron of the Fen-skate is in a straight line, but thinner towards the toe. This description of skate is used by the fast runners and competitors for prizes on the ice; a stirring scene of which, in Lincolnshire, we engraved in our Journal of last week.

From the departments of France there are accounts of intense severity of weather, particularly in the Pyrenees, the Haute Garonne, Lyons, Lille, Beppe, and other parts. Several dead bodies were found along the roads: in one place there was a man wrapped up in his cloak, lying on the ground and frozen to death; in another a traveller also dead, and his body in a sitting posture; and in a third a woman standing in the snow up to her middle, her hands clasped and raised as if in the act of recommending her soul to Heaven—she also was a corpse.

Six English horses were last week landed at Ostend, and have since been taken on through Germany by railroad. They will then embark on the Danube, and continue their journey to Cairo to take part in the trial of speed and stamina between English horses and those belonging to the Pasha of Egypt.

COUNTRY NEWS.

AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION.

The Protectionist meetings find little favour in the eyes of the town artists and humbler classes generally, according to the reported accounts in the daily papers.

On Saturday Mr. Robert Gibson, the High Sheriff of Berkshire, convened, in the words of the requisition, the "electors, ratepayers, and inhabitants of the county of BERKS, for the purpose of taking into consideration the present depressed condition of the agricultural and trading interests, consequent upon the adoption of Free Trade; and of determining upon an address to her Majesty praying for the dissolution of the present Parliament, or of such other measures of redress as the meeting shall deem expedient." The Town Hall, capacious enough to accommodate 1500 persons without inconvenient pressure, was the place of meeting. With the view of guarding against attempts at obstruction of the proceedings, some policemen were stationed inside, and near the chair, for the purpose also of guarding against the contingency of a rush in that direction. A party of special constables kept a thoroughfare in the streets for those who were entitled to attend the meeting: but all these precautions were of no avail. The Town Hall became at the time and while seated benches and seats, and all the other appliances suitable for the administration of justice. At the other end there is a platform, raised about six feet from the floor. The intermediate space was entirely free; and if it be imagined that the parties who occupied the elevated positions at both ends were spectators, and those who filled the intermediate space were actively engaged in fighting, and "tearing," and swearing and yelling, an idea may be formed of the excitement which prevailed in that part of the hall during the early part of the proceedings, which were in other respects of the ordinary character of these meetings.

At CROYDON, on the same day, there was a similar scene, on the occasion of a meeting assembled at the Town Hall, for the purpose of considering the necessity for the re-enactment of the Corn and Navigation Laws. Amongst the principal persons present were the Earl Stanhope and Mr. George F. Young. The meeting was for the most part composed of tenant-farmers and shopkeepers, amongst whom were many objectors to the propositions under discussion. Hisses, groans, and yells were kept up with increasing vigour throughout the whole of the speeches of those gentlemen who advocated a return to the old principle of Protection; and so hopeless was all attempt to gain a hearing, that Lord Stanhope, after in vain trying to appease the angry crowd, advised the chairman to dissolve the meeting, which was accordingly done, amidst derisive cheers from the Free-Traders.

In LEICESTERSHIRE the state of things was little better. On Monday, when a meeting of the farmers of the southern extremity of the county was held at Hinckley, a considerable market-town, at which there is a large manufacture of silk and cotton hose, the Town-hall was filled with farmers and stocking-weavers; and, as the business proceeded, much interruption was given to the speakers, and at last, to one of the resolutions, which was seconded by Mr. Newdegate, M. P., an amendment was moved by Mr. Ayris, a gentleman who has taken the malt-tax, but if Cobden were Prime Minister he would remove £15,000,000 of taxes—the malt-tax, and other taxes would then be taken off, not only to the relief of the farmer, but of the whole community (Cheers.) When corn was 25s a quarter, did the agricultural labourer get any more? ("Yes, yes," and counter cries of "No, no.") In Northamptonshire, when wheat was 80s. a quarter, the labourers only had 7s. a week (Cheers.) This was the torment of the stocking-maker to oppose any renewal of Protection, which meant empty bellies for the operatives and labourers, ruin to tenant-farmers, and wealth to the great landowners. (Cheers.) The chairman, before putting the question, explained that the meeting was not, in its usual sense, a public one, upon which there arose a noisy and confused debate upon that point. Mr. Barker read the notice which had been placarded, containing the words "public meeting;" but, on the other side, it was contended that the words which followed, "of those interested in the present depressed state of agriculture," limited the meaning of the word "public." At length the question was put, and a small majority appearing in favour of the amendment, the chairman dissolved the meeting, which was received with continued rounds of applause by the delegated Free-traders of Hinckley.

In YORK there was a numerous and influential meeting held on Wednesday. There were present the Duke of Cleveland, the Earl of Harewood, Lord Hawke, the Earl of Tyrconnel, the Hon. Octavius Duncombe, M.P.; the Hon. E. Lascelles, the Hon. A. Duncombe, M.P.; E. S. Cayley, Esq., M.P.; J. S. Crompton, J. B. Errand, S. Thompson, R. Denison, J. G. Smyth, M.P., G. Legard, W. Busfeild, Esqrs., and other noblemen and gentlemen. The Earl of Harewood was in the chair

In various other localities meetings have been held with better success. On Tuesday there was one at Ashford, in Kent, presided over by Mr. Cottingham, at Bingham. Those of Kent met on the same day at Edenbridge, Earl Stanhope in the chair, and agreed to an address to the Queen to dissolve the present Parliament.

FREE-TRADE MEETING AT SHEFFIELD.

Mr. Cobden paid his compliments to Sheffield and its vicinity a visit on Tuesday, and was received with quite an ovation.

In the evening there was a meeting held in the saloon of the Music-Hall, which is capable of holding 3000 persons. It was quite crowded, notwithstanding that an admission fee was charged at the doors. Mr. Ellis Ashton, mayor of Sheffield, in the chair was taken by E. Smith, Esq., of Fir Vale, and the following resolutions were agreed to; viz.—

That this meeting considers it to be one of the most important duties of the House of Commons to enforce the strictest economy in the public expenditure, so as to reduce the oppressive burden of taxation as far as possible, and that the efforts of the finance reformers in Parliament to obtain such reduction deserve the support of the country.

That in the judgment of this meeting, a large extension of the elective franchise is desirable, and might, with true wisdom, be granted to the working classes, whose generally well-ascertained and prudently managed societies for facilitating the purchase by the industrious classes of forty-shilling freeholds in land or buildings, are likely to be attended with great advantage, both social and political, to the country.

Mr. Cobden then, in a lengthened speech of much ability, developed his well-known sentiments on Free-Trade, Protection, Financial and Parliamentary Reform, &c., and the proceedings terminated with a resolution, which was carried with acclamation, expressive of the thanks of the meeting and their high sense of the merit of the hon. member

The next morning (Wednesday) the hon. gentleman was received at a public breakfast in the Cutlers' Hall. Nearly two hundred ladies and gentlemen sat down, comprising the élite of the gentry, merchants, manufacturers, and other traders of Sheffield and its neighbourhood. Joseph Burbis, Esq., the Mayor of the borough, presided; Mr. Cobden and Mr. T. A. Ward sat on the right of the chair; Mr Alderman Willey and Mr. Richard Solly were on the left. Several other leading merchants and some ladies also had seats at the principal table. Several speeches were delivered on the occasion.

DESTRUCTION BY FIRE OF THE SEAT OF THE DUKE OF MONTROSE.—On Monday night last, Buchanan House, the seat of the Duke of Montrose, Stirlingshire, the Scottish seat of the Dukes of Montrose, was totally destroyed by fire. The fire is believed to have been accidental. The ducal mansion was a fine old house, which originally belonged to the once potent family of Buchanan. It was delightfully situated in the neighbourhood of Loch Lomond; and was of late decficient in arch.tectural graces, was made up by the beauty of the site and grounds. We are glad to learn that the pictures, including that of the "Great Marquis of Montrose," were saved, and the family records.

TAXES ON LIGHT, AIR, AND VENTILATION.—It has just been determined by the Berks county magistrates, in accordance with the report of the visiting justices, to entirely stop up, having built up, all the windows in a number of the windows in the county gaol at Reading, "in order to diminish the payment of assessed taxes," it appearing that the whole of the windows in the apartments occupied by the officers, besides chimneys, are taxed annually to no trifling amount. The visiting justices, in their report, state very truly, that it appears "unjust and unreasonable to subject establishments of public utility to either Government or parochial taxes." In order to lessen the annual outlay connected with this extensive gaol, gas has been introduced, and the gaslights have just been suppressed, and much smaller burners have been substituted for those previously in use. The sum paid for gas alone, during the past year, amounted to upwards of £400.

EMIGRATION FROM LIVERPOOL.—The total emigration for the year was the extraordinary number of 153,909 persons. Of this number, 147,745 went to the United States, 4849 to British North America, 13 to the West Indies, 81 to Western Africa, 46 to the Cape of Good Hope, 43 to Hong Kong, and 573 to Australia. The whole were conveyed in 565 vessels, only 11 of which sustained damage, and but one, the Caleb Grinshaw, burnt at sea, attended with loss of life. Five of them met with accident before leaving the Mersey, one off the coast of Ireland, and another off Ardrossan. The passengers in these cases were forwarded in other ships.

EMIGRATION OF CAPITAL FROM FRANCE.—A vessel recently arrived at the port of Liverpool, from Charente, has brought 2634 bales of cotton that came French port, forming the entire cargo. This may be specially noticed as an instance of the privileges granted by the repeal of the Navigation Laws, being made also likely to the introduction from Europe of the productions of another quarter of the globe.

SEVEN FISHING SMACKS AND THIRTY-SEVEN FISHERMEN LOST.—Seven fine fishing smacks, whose crews numbered in the aggregate 37 men and boys, which left Hull prior to Christmas-Day last, and which should have returned a fortnight ago, have not since been heard of. It is supposed that the vessels perished during the gales of the 27th and 28th of December. The topmast of one (the Mary) was picked up off Lowestoffe, and brought into Hull last week. A meeting is to be held, to consider the best way of providing for the thirteen widows and twenty-five children, rendered fatherless by this appalling calamity.

According to letters received from Italy, M. de Falloux has been attacked with a cold attended with fever; the state of his health, however, is not bad, and the sensible improvement which had taken place appears to have continued

A vessel, just arrived from New Orleans, with a general cargo of American productions, has brought the large quantity of upwards of 5000 packages of lard, as a part of her cargo. [illegible], just arrived from New Orleans, has brought 339 [illegible] 35 [illegible]-barrels, and 2577 other packages of the article, of American produce.

ANTICIPATED REPEAL OF THE WINDOW-TAX.

ALTHOUGH not in the habit of laying before our readers lengthened reports of the proceedings of the Associations for promotion of the Arts and Sciences, which are labouring powerfully on all sides, yet the conviction that the period has arrived at which the Government should itself prepared to frame one of its most obvious duties, at the same time one of the most earnest desires of the people, leads us to mention the proceedings of the meeting of the Royal Institute of British Architects, on the 21st inst., which was attended by the Earl de Grey, President, who came from Yorkshire for the purpose, by Messrs. Sydney Smirke, Chadwick, Colquhoun, Dr. Arnott, Sir James Clarke, Capt. Buller, R.N., Gen. Sir C. Pasley, and more than the usual number of professional members. The subject of consideration, "Dwellings for the Industrial Classes," was ably treated by Mr. Roberts, the Hon. Architect of the Society for the Improvement of the Dwellings of the Poor, but was too technical for these pages. His structures on the want of sufficient light in the various model designs of the societies of agriculture, &c., were received with the greatest enthusiasm, and were clearly the echo of the sentiments of the assembled gentlemen, who were evidently deeply interested in the subject, and whose remarks, with some additions of our own, we subjoin.

Taking up the scheme of popular feeling since the year 1843, it appears that little or nothing has been done by Government to assist the views of those who then expressed the opinions of the public. In April of that year, Mr. Goulburn (then Chancellor of the Exchequer) was told by Mr. Southwood Smith that light and air were as essential to a healthful condition of animal life, as food. (This great fact in physiology cannot be too strongly impressed upon every person in this country.) Mr. Toynbee, a member of the same deputation, added, that he had often succeeded in hastening the cure, and preventing the spread, of further disease, among the families which he visited, by simply introducing in their rooms ventilators of perforated zinc plates. The upper sash of the window was the proper place for the ventilator, but he had often found windows stopped up, to avoid the window-tax; and the landlord usually objected to making any new opening in the walls, lest his assessment should be raised. Mr. Hickson, secretary to Mr. Ashley, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1834, had promised that, although he would not part with the window duties, he would endeavour to mitigate some of the evils which they had occasioned, and accordingly passed the act 4 and 5 William IV., c. 54, which allowed new windows to be opened free of duty; but that this act proved nugatory, from the decision that no person had been duly assessed on the 5th of April, 1835.

Most persons are aware that the smallest four and six-roomed houses require for their occupation in health, to say nothing of comfort, at least eight and eleven windows respectively; viz. one in each room, one to the door, one to the closet, one to the cupboard, and one to the door of the staircase; but how few houses of these classes can be pointed out as possessing the requisite number! Blame can hardly be imputed to the landlord, who, if he wishes to maintain repairs in his house daily, to save what every ratepayer feels is the most injudiciously imposed of all taxes; for this seems to be the present state of the law—a circular aperture in a direct line perforating the wall, and not exceeding 9 inches in diameter, in which shall not exceed one-quarter of an inch in width, is not chargeable in Liverpool (through a provision in the local act, 7 and 8 Vic., c. 11.), but is so everywhere else in England; and it is not very apparent why Liverpool should be so favoured.

The amount to which the Workmen's Lodgings in St. Pancras would be subject is £162 16s 10d per annum; and a serious drawback on the net rental of these establishments.

Nothing need be said here of the monstrous folly of charging 20 windows at the rate of 9s. 6d., and 180 at 2s. 6d.; or of a system of taxation under which houses in mean neighbourhoods, with 14 to 35 windows, rentals from £25 to £70 per annum, pay from 10 to 27 per cent on their rentals to this rate; while, in more fashionable localities, houses and clubs, with windows from 60 to 380 in number, assessed at from £700 to £3600 a year, pay only at the rate of from 2 to 4 per cent on those rentals

Sir Robert Peel's authority may be taken for assuming the number of houses in Great Britain, in 1845, to be 3,500,000, and only the half of this chargeable with window duty. No evidence can be stronger than this fact, of the immense number of houses which have been rendered unfit for habitation by the operation of the window tax, and that, too, most conclusively, on health, and on morals. Witness those lofts and cellars, without any light at all, in which human beings, at the rate of one penny each per night, are allowed to crowd together till there is not even standing-room in those pits of perdition for new-comers.

If, as is understood, the Government wants information to enable it to relinquish the window duty, the advantages which are to be gained, beyond morality and health, are the increase of employment directly to the glass manufacturer, to the joiner, the smith, and the plumber, and to the building trade generally, indirectly; and this should be impressed, as forcibly as possible, by every deputation which is sent to the Treasury. It is fair to calculate that the repeal of this tax will cause—In the manufacture of glass, a small [illegible] per cent; a moderate [illegible] per cent; and in the building trade, a considerable [illegible] per cent; an immed.ate expenditure of not less than three-quarters of a million of money.

LECTURE ON SLAVERY.—On Wednesday evening Professor Mahan, of Oberlin, U.S., delivered a lecture on slavery, in the large school-room of Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars-road, to a crowded audience, who were much interested with the graphic description of the horrors of the slave system, and information upon education in the southern states. At the conclusion of the lecture a resolution was carried, expressive of the thanks of the meeting to Professor Mahan.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The Consol Market has not been so firm this week, prices gradually declining. This might be anticipated, from the difficulty which existed at the closing of the past week in the understanding on the cheapness of money. On Monday the opening price of Consols was 96¾, the closing quotation 96⅞ to ⅞, after having declined to 96⅝. Opening on Tuesday at 96⅞, the rate became weak, and 96⅝ was the last price; still further receding on Wednesday to 96⅜ to ½, rallying, however, towards the close of business. On Thursday the market was quiet at 96⅜ to ⅝, which afterwards changed to ½ to ⅝, the last price quoted. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents have maintained higher relative quotations, having been done at 99, 99¼, 99⅜. India Bonds and Exchequer Bills still maintain their high quotations, the money regulations of the first payment on new Russian loan not yet affecting these floating securities. At the close of the week, the actual bargains were quoted at Bank Stock, 206; Reduced, 96⅝; Consols, 96⅜; New 3½ per Cent. Annuities, 98⅜; Long Annuities, to expire Jan., 1860, 8⅛; Ditto, 30 years, Jan., 1850, 8⅞; India Bonds, £1000, 90 pm.; Ditto, under £1000, 90 pm.; Consols for Account, 96⅜; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 60 pm.; Ditto, £500, June, 58 pm.; Ditto, Small, June, 58 pm.

The holders of the Russian Loan held a general meeting on Wednesday, and came to the resolve or forming a special committee to superintend their affairs only, quite apart from those of the other South American States. An office is to be opened for the receipt of subscriptions from remotely situated districts to apply for information; and a paid secretary appointed. All communications of interest are to be posted as soon as possible after receipt in the office at the Stock Exchange, and published in the newspapers. A meeting of bondholders in town must be called every six months, and may be oftener convened if necessary; and measures will be taken to secure the payment of the remanet by Messrs. Schmaltz.

The Foreign Market has been active, Buenos Ayres and Peruvian both rapidly advancing; Buenos Ayres improved 4 per cent., and Peruvian 2 per cent. Russian also advanced, and the Scrip of the New Loan has been quoted at 4 pm. Portuguese is rather flatter. Monday's quotations about last quarters. The closing registered prices of the week are—Brazilian Bonds, 88⅝; Ditto, Small, 88½; Buenos Ayres Bonds, 6 per Cent., 54½; Equador Bonds, 44; Grenada Bonds, 1 per Cent., 17¼; Ditto, Deferred, 4¼; Grenada Bonds, 3 per Cent., Account, 2 per Cent., 1840, 18½; Ditto, Account, 19¼; Ditto, Passive, 3⅞; Ditto, 3 per Cent., Account, 36¼; Venezuela Bonds, 2½ per Cent., 10½; Ditto, 5½ per Cent., 55½; Ditto, 4 per Cent. Certificates, 89⅝

Although the Share Market closes flatter still the rise in the Railway Account has been sufficient to prove that confidence is gradually returning on the part of the public. The lines least encumbered by preference stock and debenture bonds have been most prone to profitable investment, whereas the public are evidently awakening to this fact. In corroboration, it will be seen where the capital account is closing, and the revenue returns leave no alarms about meeting the preference stock and debenture charges, price advanced: South Western and Brighton may be instanced as examples. At the close of the week prices stood—Berks and Hants Extension (Gt Western, 5 per Cent. Pref.), 6 x.; Buckinghamshire, 11¼ x.; Caledonian, 12⅜ x.; Ditto, Def., 4½ Pref., 8½; Chester and Holyhead, Preference, 9¼; Dublin and Belfast Junc., 6; East Anglian, £25, L. and E. and L. and D., 1¾; Eastern Counties, 7⅛; Ditto, New, Guaranteed 6 per Cent., 11⅞; Ditto, Extension, 3 per Cent. Def., 3 pm. L.; Ditto, Northern and Eastern, 5 per Cent, 59; East Lancashire, 11¾; East Lincolnshire, 28 x. x.; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 27¾; Gt. Northern, 7 x. l.; Ditto, ¼, 5, 6 per Cent, 4½; Great South, and West, (Ireland), 30¾; Great Western, 69¾; Ditto, Half Shares, 33¾; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 16⅝; Ditto, Fifths, 13⅛; Ditto, New £17, 9; Leeds and Bradford, 103⅝; London, Brighton, and South-Coast, 84⅞; Ditto, New, 5%, Guaranteed 5% per Cent., 88⅝; London and North-Western, 117½; Ditto, New, Quarters, 14; Ditto, Fifths, 14⅛; London and South-Western, 69¾; Ditto, New, Scrip, 1848, Pref. Seven per Cent., 7⅛; Manch., Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, One-eighth Shares (No. 3), 2; Ditto, New, £10, Pref., 8⅛; Midland, 44⅞; North British, 11½; Ditto, Quarters, 2⅝; Ditto, Thirds, 3⅞; North Staffords, 7⅛; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 9½; Shrewsbury and Chester, 8 per Cent., Preference, 15½; Shropshire Union, 3½; South-Eastern, Scrip, No. 4, 6⅞; South Yorkshire, Doncaster, and Goole, 8½; West Valley, 6 per Cent., Guaranteed, 27½; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, 16⅛; Ditto, Newcastle Extension, 11; Ditto, G.N.E. Preference, 2½ x.l.; York and North Midland, 28½; Boulogne and Amiens, 7½; Namur and Liege, 7½; Sambre and Meuse, 3½

SATURDAY MORNING.—Yesterday was the day appointed for the payment of the first instalment on the new Russian loan. Several of the large private banking firms have been successful applicants; and, in common with many others of the monied interest, have paid up all the calls, taking the discount.

The price during the day was about 2½ ¾ pm. The English market was heavy on Saturday, Consols declining to 96 to ½; afterwards, however, closing at 96⅜ to ½ for Money, and 96½ ⅝ for Account. In the other markets prices did not materially vary.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The present week's arrival of English wheat up to our market to-day was been small, viz. 1310 quarters. By last carriage and sample the receipts have fallen off. Notwithstanding the market was fairly supplied with all kinds of wheat of home produce, the demand for that grain ruled heavy in the extreme, at almost nominal quotations. The foreign imports have amounted to 9000 quarters, 4000 being from Odessa in our vessel. Fine parcels were mostly held at late rates, but the middling and inferior qualities had in some instances to be sold rather lowly. Although the show of barley was small the trade ruled heavy, and prices were not supported. The transactions in malt were trifling, at late rates. The supply was good. Good mixed oats were scarce, and [illegible] dear. All other grain were neglected. Beans, peas, Indian corn, and flour, unusual.

ARRIVALS. English: wheat, 1310; barley, 1850; malt, 3510; oats, 860; flour, 4000 sacks. Irish: oats, 2960; barley, 1360 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 38s to 44s; ditto, white, 46s to 48s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 36s to 40s; ditto, white, 41s to 44s; rye, 30s to 32s; grinding barley, 18s to 21s; distilling ditto, 23s to 25s; malting ditto, 25s to 29s; Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 50s to 56s; brown ditto, 46s to 48s; Kingston and Ware, 54s to 57s. CATTLE.—The public sales held this week have been fairly attended by buyers; yet the biddings have been far from active. Green teas have changed hands to a fair extent; and common sorts have been readily cleared off at full prices. Bohea is dull but steady.

Sugar.—The West India market is still very firm, and prices are well supported. Fine qualities of Bengal and Mauritius support the late advance. In other kinds, very little is doing. The supplies of refined goods are increasing, and prices have fallen 2s per cwt. Lord and loaves are quite as dear as last week.

Coffee.—The steady moderate demand for Ceylon coffee has greatly subsided, and prices have given way 2s per cwt. The present rate is 60s per cwt. Plantation kinds, as well as foreign sorts, are dull of sale, at barely previous rates. Mocha is unaltered in value.

Tea.—The public sale held this week have been fairly attended by buyers; yet the biddings have been far from active. Green teas have changed hands to a fair extent; and common sorts have been readily cleared off at full prices. The private market is dull.

Spices.—Pepper is steady, at full prices. Privately offered pimento has been sparingly sold, at 6½d per lb. In the middling and inferior kinds, only a limited business doing. Fine Friesland is selling at 80s to 80s; fine Kiel, 90s to 92s; and inferior qualities, 50s per cwt. Fine Dutch herrings are in good request, at 30s per barrel. Scotch are sold as they are received. The deliveries continue good. Caelow, firsts, landed, 75s to 83s; Cloverfield Kirkaney, 70s to 75s; Cork, 60s to 65s; Lochfine, 60s to 65s; Limerick, 58s to 60s; Sligo, 50s to 54s, and Tralee, 50s to 56s per cwt. On board several transactions have taken place, at full prices. Fine British lingoes are in good request, and other sorts are dearer. Fine dressed is heavy, at drooping currencies. Fine Dorset, 58s to 60s; middling and inferior, 50s to 56s per cwt. Fine 5s to 5s per dozen lbs. The hams market is firm, at fully late rates. Prime Waterford sizeable, landed, 42s to 47s, heavy, 43s to 44s, and Limerick sizeable, 43s to 44s per cwt. Lard and bacon are quite as dear as last week.

Tallow.—The market is very firm, and prices have a downward tendency. P Y C on the spot, and for forward delivery, is quoted at 39s per cwt. Town tallow, 38s 6d per cwt net cash. Rough fat, 2s 8½d.

Oils.—The general demand continues steady. In prices, we have no change to report.

Provisions.—The arrivals of Irish butter have been moderate, and the demand for that article is steady, at full prices. Foreign is in fair request, at prices fully equal to those obtained last week. In the middling and inferior kinds, only a limited business doing. Fine Friesland is selling at 80s to 80s; fine Kiel, 90s to 92s; and inferior qualities, 50s per cwt. Fine 5s to 5s per dozen lbs. The hams market is firm, at fully late rates. Prime Waterford sizeable, landed, 42s to 47s, heavy, 43s to 44s, and Limerick sizeable, 43s to 44s per cwt. Lard and bacon are quite as dear as last week.

CLOSE OF HOLIDAYS.—Now that the season of annual festivity is about to terminate, and the respective boarding-schools about to be opened by the busy hands of youthful mothers, comforts and attractions become naturally an object of great solicitude. Those who have suffered from the effects of MACASSAR OIL, for accelerating the growth and for improving and beautifying the hair, will find that the following testimonial is a slight case of the many advantages now to be obtained in selecting from this Stock:—Thousands of yards of real French Merinoes

DESTRUCTION OF CAVERSHAM-PARK HOUSE BY FIRE.

DESTRUCTION OF CAVERSHAM-PARK HOUSE, BY FIRE.

ON Friday morning week, between seven and eight o'clock, an extensive conflagration broke out at Caversham-park, near Reading, the seat of Mr. William Crawshay, the well-known ironmaster, situate about two miles from this town, which, we regret to state, was entirely destroyed. Mr. Crawshay and the family being from home, and expected to return the next day, the house had for some days previously been undergoing a proper airing; and the fires having unfortunately become over heated, was the cause of the outbreak. On the domestics rising at the usual hour in the morning, a strong smell, as of something burning, was noticed, and on the drawingroom being entered shortly afterwards, a dense body of smoke and flame presented itself. An alarm was instantly raised, and a messenger was despatched to Reading for the engines, while all the labourers on the estate were hastily summoned to render assistance. The county engine was the first to arrive, which was quickly followed by the Phœnix and borough engines. In the meantime the fire had gained rapid accendancy, the flames having penetrated several rooms communicating with the drawingroom, until at length they had enveloped the whole building. As all hopes of saving the mansion were now at an end, the efforts of the workmen present continued to be directed to rescuing such portion of the furniture and other valuable property as could be safely approached, which afterwards lay strewn out in the park. Unfortunately, no water was near at hand, there being only a pond at some distance from the house, and, in consequence, two of the engines were placed to supply the third, which played upon some out-offices, the only portion of the property which there appeared to be any chance of saving. The conflagration presented a scene of fearful grandeur, especially on some portions of the roofing giving way, when the flames burst forth with increased fury. The work of demolition internally continued unabated for several hours; and, as each portion of the burning mass gradually gave way, the utmost alarm and anxiety were felt for the safety of some of the workmen and others, who evinced great courage in endeavouring to save some portion of the household property. The roof of the large dining-hall gave way with a tremendous crash, and, all the internal portion of the mansion being now destroyed, nothing remained but the mere skeleton of the once noble residence. The outer walls gradually fell in, and the work of destruction went on so rapidly that within six hours after the outbreak of the flames nothing but a heap of ruins presented itself.

The greater portion of the household furniture, plate, and other valuable effects was saved, though other property, to a considerable amount, was destroyed.

The mansion and effects, we regret to find, were uninsured, though, singularly enough, Mr. Crawshay had the precaution to insure all his farm property in the neighbourhood, while he deemed the insurance of his own dwelling unnecessary.

The mansion and domain once belonged to the noble family of Cadogan; it was afterwards inhabited by the Marsac family, and some few years since was purchased by Mr. Crawshay, who is lord of the manor, and who lately enlarged the front of the mansion.

CHURCH OF ST. JOHN THE EVANGELIST, PENGE COMMON.

THIS neat and substantial Church has just been erected near the Almshouses of the Watermen's Company, at Penge Common, contiguous to the Sydenham station of the Croydon Railway. It is intended for the accommodation of the inmates of the Asylum, and for the inhabitants of the locality in general.

The cost of the building has exceeded £5000, the greater portion of which sum has been raised by voluntary subscription, to which T. D. Brown, Esq., has munificently contributed one thousand guineas, besides giving the ground for the site. The Church is dedicated to Saint John the Evangelist; and the patronage of the living has been granted to the Watermen's Company in perpetuity.

The style of the building is Early English, of extremely plain character, but effectively carried out, both as respects proportion and detail. The materials are Kentish rag-stone, with Bath stone dressings. The plan comprises a nave, with north and south aisles; a chancel and chancel aisle; a south porch and a vestry: the main feature being a tower and spire, about 150 feet high, which rises from the west end of the nave, and is, interiorly, open to it by a lofty arch.

The interior has a solemn effect; hereafter, we hope, to be aided by the filling of the great east window with stained glass. Already, there has been placed in the south aisle a window, representing the first two miracles of our Saviour, presented by Mr. T. D. Brown. The roof has open timber rafters; there is no gallery; the pulpit is sculptured from a single block of stone. It is of octagonal form, and has a foliated bracket for the books; they are very conveniently arranged; and there are a sufficient number of free seats for the poor of the neighbourhood. The sittings are for 500 persons. All the arches and jambs, internally as well as externally, are built with properly dressed freestone; and the entire building reflects the highest credit upon Messrs. Round and Nash, the architects, Great George-street, Bermondsey; and on Mr. Myers, the contractor. The sum of £700 is still wanting to complete the building fund, notwithstanding the liberality of the neighbouring gentry.

The church was opened for divine service in October last, under a license granted by the Bishop of Winchester. Two sermons were preached on the day of opening by the Rev. Joseph Ridgeway, A.M., who has been appointed incumbent by the Watermen's Company. The consecration by the Bishop is deferred, on account of the insufficiency of funds.

CHURCH OF ST. JOHN THE EVANGELIST, PENGE COMMON.

CHURCH EXTENSION.—The Incorporated Society for Promoting the Building, Enlargement, and Reparation of Churches and Chapels, held a meeting on Monday, the Venerable Archdeacon Jones in the chair. The following grants were made in aid of the erection of churches at Sayers Common, in the parish of Hurstperrepoint, Sussex; at Newburgh, in the parish of Ormskirk; at Kidmore-end, in the parish of Caversham, near Reading, Berks; and at Gwersyrtt, in the parish of Gresford, near Wrexham. Besides these four new churches, grants in aid were made towards fitting up with seats, as a chapel of ease, a building recently purchased, situated in Crown-street, in the parish of St. Ann, Soho. Grants were also made towards rebuilding the church at Newington, near Bishop's Auckland; likewise, towards various alterations and improvements contemplated in the parish churches of Houton, near Newcastle-in-Emlyn; Leigh, near Sherborne, Dorsetshire; Tavensy, near Ditton; Esh, near Durham; and Talland, near Polperro, in Cornwall.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND ENGLAND.—The projectors of an electric telegraph communication between New York and the Isle of Wight will bring their plan before Congress at its present session. They propose to lay down a substantial insulated wire of thirty-six fibres, coated one-half inch with gutta percha, and to guarantee its working in perfect integrity for ten years. They offer to complete it in twenty months from the date of contract, for a sum not to exceed 3,000,000 dollars.

LARGE SNAKE.—The Moulmein Times (India) of October 23 states that on the previous Tuesday, a large snake, measuring 15½ feet long, was killed by Lieutenant West, of the 11th Regiment Madras Native Infantry. The snake was first seen while in the act of swallowing a fowl, the noise of the fowl having brought the servants to the spot. Lieutenant West, on the snake being pointed out to him, with his sword pierced the head through, and fixed the blade in the ground. The snake, feeling the sudden shock, immediately turned round by the tail, and in a moment coiled round Lieutenant West; but his servants being present, they succeeded in uncoiling it from his body after a long struggle, fortunately without his sustaining any injury from the embraces of the reptile.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.

The Regius Professor of Divinity proposes to resume the reading of Dr. Routh's Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Opuscula, on Tuesday, the 5th of February. These lectures are open to all members of the University who have passed the B.A. Examination. And those who wish to attend are requested to call on the Professor between one and two o'clock on Monday, the 4th of February.

The Regius Professor of Divinity will begin a course of lectures on Thursday, the 21st of February, at one o'clock, at Christ Church. These lectures are intended for students of divinity, who have passed their examination for the degree of B.A. The professor requests those who desire to attend to deliver in their names to him on Wednesday, Feb. 20, with a written recommendation, either from the Governor of their college or from their tutor.

GOLD FROM CALIFORNIA.

ON Wednesday, the 16th instant, an interesting paper, entitled "California, its Produce and Prospects," was read to the Society of Arts, by Mr. A. Walls, of Lime-street; being a communication from Alexander Crosse, Esq., of Valparaiso. The paper included a variety of historical and statistical details of the Gold Country, and the mode of collecting the metal; at the close of which, several samples of gold from various countries were exhibited, and among them, a magnificent specimen from California, originally intended for the cabinet of LUMP OF GOLD FROM CALIFORNIA—ACTUAL SIZE—WEIGHT, 6 lb. 8 oz. 14 dwt. 12 gr.

Queen Victoria. It weighs 6lb. 8 oz. 14 dwts. 12 gr., and is said to be the largest and purest lump yet received. It is perfectly amorphous, the size of a small human hand, much water-worn, composed of nearly pure gold, having only on its surface a very few broken crystals of quartz in the hollows as they existed in the matrix; and, at £4 5s per pound, would be worth intrinsically about £300; but, from its extraordinary character, as a specimen, is valued at far above that sum. At the conclusion, the thanks of the Society were voted with applause to Mr. Walls, for his interesting paper; and the chairman requested Mr. Tennant to offer a few remarks.

Mr. Tennant said the peculiar character of the specimen before the meeting consisted in its extreme purity; in general, it was desirable to have some of the matrix present, to enable us to judge of the parent rock. Of course, he did not say this in disparagement, as it was a most magnificent specimen, and far eclipsed one which he had purchased a few days since, which was in a glass case on the table; that, however, was a rare specimen, weighing 9½ oz., and perfectly pure. (It was engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for December 1.) He (Mr. Tennant) said he thought the gold-seekers, in their anxiety after the precious metal, were throwing away produce of still more value. In some specimens he had detected crystals of garnet, grains of platina, &c.; and he had no doubt diamonds were to be found in the debris of the Californian rocks, if so, and only fit for use as diamond dust, it was worth £50 per oz.; and would well repay patient research. With respect to the quantity of gold obtained from that country, it was to a much greater extent than many persons imagined, within the past twelve months no less than 10 tons of the precious metal had passed through one house.

A vote of thanks having been passed to Mr. Tennant, Mr. Evan Hopkins proceeded to detail some of his experience in the gold-producing districts of South America.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

The British Legislature commenced its sittings last year, amid the gratulations of the Free-Trade party, and preceded by a monster meeting in the Free-Trade Hall of Manchester. It opens this year with somewhat similar accompaniments—the principal difference being that the Protectionist party has gathered strength in the interval, and given unmistakeable proof of its determination once more to try the question with its opponents. Both parties are in full vigour, though the Free-Traders are somewhat quieter than usual. The one party points to the gold in the coffers of the Bank, and to the immense increase of our exports, to prove that cheap corn bought of the foreigner does not drain the country of the precious metals, and dwells with complacency upon the flourishing state of the revenue, and the increased employment given to the people. The other party ignores as far as possible the prosperity of manufactures, explains away the glut of gold in Threadneedle-street, and asserts, with dolorous complaint and angry objurgation, the ruin of agriculture. Both parties speak in the fulness of heart, and with the earnestness of conviction; and each has the same confidence that it is supported by the general sentiment of the country. On the part of the Government there is equal confidence upon this one particular question. Her Majesty's Speech is firm and decided as regards both the Corn-laws and the Navigation-laws; and the very choice of such a person as Mr. Charles Villiers to move the Address is an additional proof that, however weak or vacillating the Ministry may be in its general policy, it has taken its stand upon Free-Trade, and will stake its existence upon it. The result of the debate on the Address will decide the character of the Session, and the fate of the Ministry.

The other domestic topics mentioned in the Royal Speech are happily of a character to call forth no strife of parties. The respectful tribute to the many virtues of the late Queen Dowager will meet with a sympathetic response throughout the country. The improved state of the national revenue, and the promise of a reduction of our expenditure for warlike purposes, will excite general satisfaction. The country will expect, as a necessary consequence of such a state of things, a reduction or abolition of one or more of the most burdensome items of taxation. It is too much to hope that we shall be enabled to shake off the incubus of a property-tax; but, failing that consummation—so devoutly to be wished by all the hard-working, struggling, and most useful classes of society—there is some ground to expect that we may be relieved of the Window-tax, and the Excise duties upon soap and paper. The thankfulness expressed for the cessation of the scourge of Cholera will be but a mockery of gratitude, if the State allows taxes upon the health and cleanliness of the people, like those upon windows and upon soap, to continue any longer. We are glad to see that the Ministry are fully aware of their duty in this respect, and that they have not forgotten the fact, that the prevention of a pestilence by the precautionary means which Providence has kindly placed within our reach, is infinitely better than its cure. It is to be hoped that no unnecessary delays will intervene before the introduction of a wisely-considered and thoroughly-matured sanitary bill, which shall embrace in its operations the large towns of the whole kingdom—from London, Glasgow, and Dublin, to Manchester, Edinburgh, and Leeds—and all those minor, but still overcrowded hives of human industry, where wealth is created, and human life sacrificed, at one and the same time.

Ireland unhappily affords no opportunity for the expression of more than a cordial hope of better days; but the auspicious visit of July and August last has enabled her Majesty to record once more, in the enduring form of a Speech to Parliament, her grateful recognition of the loyalty and affection of that deeply interesting portion of her dominions. That the sectarian and other feuds which have so long embittered the minds of the people, and retarded their material progress, may speedily cease; and that all parties may unite in the effort to employ productively, and educate in a manner becoming a free and civilised people, the unhappy lads of the Irish soil, is a prayer in which every well-wisher of Great Britain, as well as Ireland, will agree. Bad as is its present condition, neither the statesmanship of our rulers nor the common-sense of the people will permit us to despair of the regeneration of Ireland —not, perhaps, by any one enactment, or by any sudden operation; but by the gradual removal of hindrances and obstructions; by the progressive enlightenment of the suffering classes, from landed proprietors down to the veriest paupers; and the healing influence of time and experience.

The Foreign relations of the country afford just ground for Royal congratulation. We are at peace with all the world; and there is not even a speck of clouds upon the horizon to give the warning of a storm. The one speck, that seemed not long ago to be the forerunner of a tempest, has been dissipated into thin air. Russia has withdrawn her demands upon the Ottoman Porte, and our ancient ally remains secure from aggression, without any necessity for our protection or interference. Foreign nations, instead of quarrelling with us, are beginning to imitate our example in unfettering commerce. The United States and Sweden have hailed the repeal of our Navigation Laws as an era in the history of trade, and met our advances with entire cordiality. Holland is preparing to do the same; and at no distant date, unless appearances are deceptive, Russia and France will enter upon the same career. There is nothing in the present state of any European or American nation to give us cause for uneasiness. Great as have been, and as are likely to be, the difficulties and commotions of continental Europe, they can affect us but indirectly. It does not signify greatly to this country whether the states of Germany shall be homogeneous or heterogeneous. We can but wish that they may be free, happy, and industrious. Our interest in the affairs of Italy is more sentimental than practical. We can but desire that the peace of Europe may not be disturbed by them; that the French may learn a lesson of non-intervention by the embarrassing results of their Roman expedition; and that the Pope and his Cardinals may open their eyes, ere it be too late, to the danger of their present policy. Our relations with our nearest neighbours are more important. Upon Great Britain and France—the vanguard of civilization—the great duty of peace and amity is devolved; for their own sakes, and for that of the world in general. At the present time it may be performed, as it often is ought to be, in a manner which proves it to be a pleasure. That the good feeling may not only be perpetuated, but that it may increase as it grows older, is not merely the interest of France and England; it is the necessity of Europe.

The only other topic touched upon in the Royal Speech is the state of our Colonial relations. This is delicate ground. Our Colonies are not satisfied; and it must be owned that they have but too much reason of complaint against us. Self-government may, perchance, enable them to increase in wealth, strength, and happiness, and transform them from dissatisfied dependants into contented friends and customers of the mother state. This country is proud of her off-shoots, and has no desire that they should be injured or oppressed by the inadvertent mistakes, or the wilful misgovernment, of our Colonial Office. Any reform in the administration of that office, or any grant of the right of self-government to our Colonies, will meet, there can be no doubt, with the general approbation of all parties in the country. Upon the whole, the Royal Speech is a satisfactory document, and foreshadows a course of policy which, if carried out, is likely to be beneficial both at home and abroad.

HIGH TIDE IN THE THAMES.

On Tuesday, the tide rose so extraordinarily high as to overflow the banks of the river and inundate the various thoroughfares along either shore. So unexpected was the high tide, that no one had made any preparation to preserve their property, and the consequence was that mischief to an incalculable amount was done. The tide on the previous day was 7 feet 9 inch, it had been known to be for some considerable time past; whilst that of Tuesday rose two feet one inch higher than it did in October, 1846, when so much property was destroyed. The various wharves along the river presented immense scenes of confusion, whilst the waters arising forced about with the strength of the tide; whilst the small craft lying on the shores of the Thames were either filled with water or forced into the open streets. In Lambeth, and the two adjoining parishes, property worth many thousand pounds was destroyed. In the neighbourhood of the Commercial, Belvidere, and York-roads, a vast deal of damage was done. In the Crescent of Belvidere-road, the houses have wasted-cellars, in which the furniture is destroyed. As late as eight o'clock in the evening the whole of College-street was under water about four feet the lower floors of the houses being full of water, whilst the people were anxiously looking from the upper windows for the flood to recede. Even at that period, the inhabitants were taken to and from their residences by horses and carts. The furniture belonging to nearly fifty persons in that street was either destroyed or extensively damaged. So deep did the water rise in the Commercial-road, that boats were employed as conveyances during the flood. Fore-street, Lambeth, Bishop's-walk, as well as the several wharves on the opposite side of the river, at Millbank, were all under water. Along Vauxhall, the Lammas lands at Fulham and Battersea, the open country presented broad sheets of water, in many places several feet deep. At Barnes'es, Barnes-terrace and Kelner'sin the vast amount of damage has been done. It would be impossible to give a list of the whole of the premises injured, as scarcely a building on either side of the river escaped. The tide completely overflowed the Temple Gardens; and the sundial thus insulated, as were also the trees, had a very strange appearance.

At the New House of Parliament, the preparations made for the "predicted" high tide a few weeks since, and consisting of brickwork culverts, enclosing the openings to the basement, not having been removed, proved of great service, as the water entirely covered the embankment of the river front.

We have illustrated two of the localities in Lambeth—Vine-street, and Lambeth Stairs.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

REDUCTION OF THE STAFF IN IRELAND.—It is stated that the Athlone district appointments are to be abolished, and will accordingly be omitted in the army estimates for this year. In the estimates for past years it will be perceived that the said district was under the command of a Major-General, who had one A.de-Camp and an Assistant Adjutant-General. These appointments were kept up at annual expense of £1100. Thus, should the reduction in the staff actually take place, this item of expense will be saved to the public.

Rear-Admiral Austen, C.B., the newly-appointed Commander-in-Chief to the East India station, and his Secretary, go out overland to the East Indies.

THE LATE QUEEN DOWAGER'S PROPERTY.—We are enabled to announce that the whole of the magnificent furniture and effects of her late lamented Majesty the Queen Dowager are about to be disposed of privately, under the direction of Mr. Owen, of New Bond-street. This arrangement has been determined on in order to avoid the inconvenience of a public auction; and the manner in which the sale will be effected is something as follows:—An inventory has been made of the whole of the late Queen's property at Marlborough House, Bushy Park, and the Priory. The value of each article has been fixed for probate duty in the usual manner; and with a view to the convenient disposal of the effects this estimate has been appended to every lot of furniture, plate, linen, and every other description of property not included in the bequests of her late Majesty. There will be no public admission, but private invitations to the leading members of the aristocracy and gentry have been issued by Mr. Owen for Tuesday next, on which day the sale at Marlborough House will commence. The property includes some very superb articles of furniture, upwards of 20,000 ounces of plate, a large quantity of Sèvres and Dresden porcelain, and the usual effects of a mansion devoted to the habitation of Royalty. The jewellery will not be sold, the late Queen having disposed of this portion of her property, by bequest, to various friends and dependants. We understand that negotiations are in progress, the result of which will probably be the purchase of the effects contained in Bushy House by her Majesty the Queen.

Early on Saturday morning last, the premises of Mr. F. Reeve Jones, a solicitor, residing at Woodfield terrace, Harrow-road, near the Paddington workhouse, were broken into, and various articles, consisting of plate, wearing apparel, &c., stolen therefrom. A servant, who slept in a room just above where the entrance was effected, heard a noise in the lower part of the house, but attributing it to the wind, which was very high at the time, accompanied by rain, she took no further notice of it. A reward has been offered by Mr. Jones for the discovery of the culprits.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Moderate liberty, free from democratic excess on the one hand, and vexatious restrictions on the other, which are productive only of irritation against, and contempt for, the existing state of things, appears to be a thing beyond the conceptions of the governing class in France.

When they are not battling à ciel ouvert against Revolutionists, they are endeavouring to repress all legitimate discussion, which, if permitted fairly and freely would be found the most effectual means of guarding against insurrections and revolutions. Amongst the various prosecutions lately instituted against the political journals of Paris and the departments, by the Attorney-General of the Republic, there is one that has just occurred in which the spirit of oppression has met with a complete rebuff. It was directed against the proprietor and editor of the Presse, M. E. Girardin.

The charge against the clever editor of the Presse was, that he had set the law at defiance by publishing in article of the Reforme, which had just been condemned by a jury. M. de Girardin stood on the ground that the article formed a portion of the trial, which he had a right to give. To this the prosecutor for the Government replied that the article in question was not given as a portion of a reported trial, but in a leading article, with editorial comments, and stripped of the condemnatory remarks of both judges and state counsel, and so constituted a repetition of the offence committed by the Reforme, with considerable aggravation. The object put forward by M. de Girardin was, that he wanted to rescue the newspaper press from the oppressive libel laws, by showing that prosecutions only served to draw attention to articles which otherwise might have escaped general notice, and to spread the poison, through the reports of the trial which should necessarily take place. The jury put it on a verdict of "Not Guilty." The same verdict was given the day previously, in a similar case against the Gazette de France. Thus has the Attorney-General suffered two defeats within as many days, at the hands of Paris juries.

Count Strogonoff, brother of Count Strogonoff who was some time since Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, has been appointed Ambassador for Russia to the French Republic. Count Strogonoff is a particular and confidential friend of the Emperor's. He is to bring a brilliant and numerous staff to Paris, and it is said that the object of the mission is at the same time to strengthen the position of the President of the Republic, and to create a diversion against Lord Normanby, who, in the opinion of the Czar, enjoys too much influence at the Republican Court. M. de Kisseleff, the present Minister at Paris, is to be appointed to another court.

M. Thiers is again confined to his house with the complaint in his tongue. He is unable to speak, and is obliged to use signs to communicate his wants. Should M. Thiers have the misfortune to lose his speech, France will afford the singular spectacle of having one of the greatest orators and statesmen dumb, and her greatest historian (M. Thierry) blind.

The authorities have commenced a war against the trees of liberty in Paris. A great number of them have been cut down within the last two days in all parts of Paris by order of the police. M. Léon Faucher only ventured to pull down the bonnets rouges which were placed upon the trees of liberty; M. Ferdinand Barrot attacked the trees themselves.

The abolition of universal suffrage, or, at least, the resolve to limit it as much as possible by indirect means, would appear to be contemplated by the Government of Louis Napoleon. The registration for the department of the Seine has just closed, and the impediments thrown in the way of those claiming to be placed on the lists were so numerous and vexatious, that many of the working classes, and even of the bourgeoisie, gave up the affair in despair. The consequence has been, that upwards of 60,000 names have been struck off the lists in Paris alone. A change is also proposed in the system of taking the votes. At present, the representatives for the departments are all elected for the whole department, in place of ones being elected for each district. The result of this change will be, to give effect to local and personal interests, and consequently to improve the class of persons elected as representatives.

The enjoyment of the Carnival appears to be at present the main occupation of all classes in Paris, and dinners, balls, and soirées succeed each other in quick succession

By a decree signed by the President of the Republic, the pension of the ex-King Jerome Bonaparte, as Governor of the Invalides, is reduced from 60,000f. to 40,000f., in consequence of his receiving, since his appointment as Governor, the pay of a Marshal of France.

Amongst the members of the Assembly, during the week, a prominent subject of conversation was an alleged negotiation said to have been opened at Venice between the two branches of the ex-Roya. families, and which, it is believed, had ended in their coming to an understanding.

A letter from Marseilles of the 26th ult. announces the arrival of Horace Vernet on his return from Rome, where he has been studying the theatre of the last operations of the French army, previous to his preparation of his grand historical painting.

SWITZERLAND.

Statements that appear to be authentic have reached us from the frontiers of Switzerland, to the effect that an attempt at a revolutionary movement for the present or the next month, is in contemplation by the revolutionists in that country, and that the Governments most interested in the affair have received ample information on the subject, and are determined to take strong measures to suppress the very first attempt that may be made again to disturb the peace of Europe

ITALIAN STATES.

From Rome we learn that the Pope's return, now that the requisite loan has been effected from Messrs. Rothschild, is to be immediately expected, and the 2nd inst. even has been named as the day of his entry, but this date appears rather too early. A deputation of Cardinals and Bishops from the Holy City of Jerusalem have been invited to meet at Rome in the present month. They are to attend in person, or to be represented by delegates furnished with regular powers. The province of Romagna is infested by brigands.

From Naples it is announced that an amnesty of the minor political offenders has been published by the King.

AUSTRIA

From Vienna we learn that the Cabinet there have been lately engaged in the serious consideration of a project for the cession by Austria to Piedmont of a considerable portion of Lombardy. Austria wants money badly, and desires to relieve herself of the risk of another rising in Lombardy, and would willingly cede for a valuable consideration so much of Lombardy as would give the Mincio for a boundary to Piedmont. As it has been deemed necessary to consult France and England, the proposition has been submitted to those Powers.

PRUSSIA.

Recent accounts from Berlin state that the elections of the electors for the Erfurt Parliament have just taken place in that city and the rest of Prussia. In most cases the Democratic party refrained from voting, and the result is, therefore, of course, favourable to the Conservative Constitutionalist party. In several of the other principalities of the German Confederation the elections have also taken place with the same result.

RUSSIA.

From St. Petersburgh, under date the 18th ult., we learn that the Russians have once more gained an advantage over the Caucasians. An engagement took place on the 3rd Jan., on the right bank of the Ossa, with 3000 soldiers of Schamil. The Russians took from them two standards, thirty prisoners, and a great number of cattle. The Russians had only three Cossacks wounded (?), while the mountaineers left three hundred dead on the field of battle!

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

We have Cape Town journals to December 8th, and those from Graham's Town to December 1st.

The Cape Town Observer has the following:—"At the last meeting of the Anti-Convict Association, it appeared that the Government, after having been paid the penalties of the broken contracts, avail themselves of the strict letter of these documents, by claiming from the parties concerned the difference between the amounts which they have to pay to third parties for the supplies which the contractors were to furnish, and the amount they have cost them under the contract. They appear indeed, therefore, to be extremely liberal to Captain Stanford and others, at the contractors' expense. Under these circumstances the guilt of those who now make such a simple affair so much appear than ever, seeing that they do so at the charges not of the Government, but the contractors."

At a meeting of shopkeepers, held on Nov. 29th, resolutions were passed pledging those present to adhere to the anti-convict pledge, as regards Government supplies.

Many other meetings of a similar tendency had been held in various parts of the colony.

AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION.

MEETING AT BRIGHTON.

The sixth annual meeting of the Sussex Society for the Protection of Agriculture and Native Industry was held on Saturday, at the Old Ship Assembly-Rooms, Brighton. The Duke of Richmond (President of the Society) took the chair; and among those present were the Earl of March, M.P., and R. Pryme, Esq., M.P.

The Duke of Richmond said he was not going to take up the time of this meeting at any length. It is not for me to intrude myself in giving advice to the farmers of England—I have no right so to do; but, perhaps, as the president of this society, you may think I can take no more on myself if I venture to say a few words as to the course I think we all ought to pursue. (Hear, hear.) My advice to you is, to be firm and determined. I ask you not by violence to attempt to put down the present view; but I ask you to show yourselves free-born Englishmen, not fearing to express your grievances in any quarter where you think you have a right to obtain redress. I ask you not to be beaten down if those grievances should be sneered at and laughed at; but in this country I look to the opinion of the people of England, after a time, to come to a right and just principle. I believe that right must have dominion over wrong; and that sooner or later we shall return to that fair system of protection to all domestic industry without which this country cannot continue to be great. (Cheers.) I therefore recommend you to steadily pursue the object which you have in view. I ask you by every constitutional means in your power to attempt to get rid of a Government in whom we cannot have the slightest confidence, because we know, whatever their own individual opinions may be, they have unfortunately truckled to a knot of free-trade manufacturers, and they are now led, not constitutionally, permit me to say, by the leader of that party who got rid of protection to domestic industry. (Hear.)

Mr. John Pankhurst then read the report, which was adopted, and the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman, who acknowledged the compliment.

Protectionist meetings have also been held during the week at Bedford and Oakham, Swaffham, Prestaign, Buckingham, Brecon, and various other localities.

IRELAND.

FREE-TRADE v. PROTECTION.—GREAT MEETING IN DUBLIN.

On Monday the great meeting convened by the Lord Mayor, on a requisition signed by a large number of the citizens of Dublin, "to ascertain the true feelings of the public on the all-important subject of Free-Trade," was held in the Rotunda. For more than an hour before the time appointed for the commencement of the proceedings, the neighbourhood of the Rotunda was crowded by persons anxious to gain admission to the building; and a number of placards, surmounted by 4-lb. loaves, were carried about Upper Sackville-street. Under these loaves was the following, in large letters:—"4-lb. loaf—price in 1847, 10½d.; 4-lb. loaf—price in 1850, 5d." The operatives assembled in tremendous force, the coal and corn-porters, a powerful-looking set of fellows, mustering in large numbers. Five hundred policemen, under the direction of Mr. Superintendent Macarthy, were present to see that "the peace" was kept; and altogether the meeting was the greatest in-door demonstration that has been witnessed in Dublin for several years. At half-past twelve, a stalwart individual, carrying a pole, with a large loaf stuck on the top of it, entered the room, surrounded by a strong, though unarmed, body guard, and was received with deafening cheers. The placards which had figured outside were also brought in and held aloft, to the intense gratification of the lower class. Soon after this a sack of loaves was carried to the platform and laid along the committee table. This bread showed the comparative size of loaves at a given price now and in the year 1847. The Protectionists crowded the platform. Amongst those present were the Earl of Mayo; Edward Grogan, Esq., M.P.; Isaac Butt, Esq., Q.C.; the Rev. T. D. Gregg, Andrew R. Stritch, Dr. Gray, Wilson Gray, Alderman Hudson, Alderman Taggart, Captain Egan, William Purdon, Mr. Costelloe, Michael Lynch, James Haughton, Thomas Reynolds, P. Baker, Jas. Fagan, M.P.; John Adye Curran, E. O'Mahony, Cornelius Dennehy, J. Kelch, Thomas Ryan, George Renwick, W. Bond, W. O. Espy, W. Digges, Thomas Jones, Jonathan Sisson, R. Wallis, K. Teeling, Baron Von Stentz, Alderman Reynolds, Martin Burke, the Very Rev. Dr. Spratt, Alderman Moran, &c.

At half-past one o'clock the chair was taken by the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor (who appeared in his civic robes). In opening the proceedings, he congratulated the meeting on the immense demonstration of that day—a meeting composed of all classes of his fellow citizens and of all creeds. (Loud cheers.) He trusted, therefore, that no interpiece calculated to cause delay would occur in the proceedings. He hoped that the United Kingdom would ever be united. (Cheers and hisses).

A Voice: A cheer for John Mitchell. (Cheers.)

The Lord Mayor continued: He had refused to preside over a meeting of one side; and he knew that the question would be discussed in a gentlemanly manner. (Cheers.)

Mr. James Caulfield, a tenant-farmer of the county Kildare, proposed the first resolution:—

That we look upon the present attempt to revive protection on agricultural produce as a deliberate device to bolster up an iniquitous system of taxation and landed law; and that in order to enable the tenant-farmers of this country to meet successfully foreign competition, and reduced prices consequent thereupon, a corresponding reduction must be made in their rents, and perfect security must be given them for that they will enjoy the entire benefit by occupation or full compensation of such labour and capital as they may invest in the improvement of their holdings.

Mr. Patrick Sweetman seconded the resolution.

Some other gentlemen having spoken in support of the resolution,

Mr. Butt rose amid a scene of tremendous confusion, cheers, groans, &c. He moved, as an amendment to the first part of the resolution—the second part he did not object to—that it was the duty of the Government to find every encouragement to the trade and manufactures of the country, and that this could not be done if the principles of Free-Trade were carried out. (Groans.) Would they, as rational men, prefer low wages and a big loaf to good wages and a loaf of a smaller size? (Groans, cries of "Free-Trade," and a tremendous confusion, during which the Rev. T. D. Gregg threw a loaf to the people in the body of the room.) This was the real question. (Groans, tremendous uproar, imitations of cock-crowing, whistling, and all sorts of noises.)

The Lord Mayor interposed, but in vain; the meeting would not hear him.

The resolution and amendment were then put from the chair, and the former was declared to be carried by a large majority.

The next resolution was as follows:—

That any tax on human food, having for its object the increase of its price, and thereby rendering the sustentation of human life more difficult, is a wrong, contrary alike to Christianity, and sound policy, as had been too fatally illustrated in the history of Ireland for the last half-century

An amendment, insisting upon the absolute necessity and justice of Protection, was moved by the Rev. T. Gregg, but it was lost, and the resolution carried almost unanimously.

The third set forth—

That the calamitous condition to which all classes and interests in this country have been reduced by misgovernment and neglect, demands the application of prompt and efficient measures for the reconstruction of our social system on a sound basis; and we hereby unanimously protest against the attempt to represent the present evils of the country as justifying the views of its very system under which they were produced.

Mr. Battersby seconded the resolution, which was put and carried nem. con.

The adoption of a petition to Parliament, embodying those resolutions, was passed, and the proceedings terminated at eight o'clock.

LORD RODEN.—The address which has been in contemplation for some time past to Lord Roden, in connexion with the Orange processions of the 12th of July next, was presented to that noble Lord on Friday, in Dublin, by a deputation composed of the Earls of Mayo and Glengall, Lords Dunsany and Suirdale, several clergymen and gentry. The noble Earl received the address with much satisfaction, and returned an appropriate reply.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN.—On Tuesday, judgment was given by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of "Wauchob v. Reynolds," when the Judges decided by three to one that the point raised as to the ineligibility of Mr. Reynolds to remain on the burgess roll was established by the evidence laid before the court, and it was accordingly ordered that his name should be erased from the list of burgesses entitled to the municipal franchise. Mr. Justice Perrin was the dissentient judge. Mr. Justice Moore was not present, but had entrusted his proxy to the keeping of the Chief Justice. Mr. Reynolds is, therefore, no longer legally Lord Mayor of Dublin.

GREAT WILL CASE.—On Tuesday, judgment was given in the Prerogative Court, in the long-protracted case of Kelly v. Thewles, which involves in its decision personal property to the amount of nearly £600,000. Judge Keatinge decided that the will executed by the late Edwd. Kelly, of Rookwood, co. of Galway, and of Merrion-square, Dublin, was valid, and entitled to the probate of the court. Each party pay their own costs.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The weather took so decided a turn at the commencement of the week that field sports have been resumed; the Louth Steeple-chase and various coursing meetings have come off, and there appears every reasonable prospect that the fixtures announced for next week will hold good. Of steeple-chasing the progression is meagre, Bromley (West Kent) alone holding out any inducements to the lovers of this class of racing. The coursing community, however, will have their hands full, the Ashdown Park and Newmarket Clubs commencing operations on Tuesday; the Shelthorne, at their new locale (Overton, near Swindon), on Tuesday; and the Altcar, Aske, and Lytham on Thursday. As all these are "crack" clubs, some first-rate sport may be anticipated.

TATTERSALL'S.

On Monday last, a splendid portrait, by Grant, of Sir Tatton Sykes, subscribed for by upwards of 800 gentlemen, was presented to him at the De Grey Rooms, in the city of York. An excellent dinner was provided on the occasion of the presentation, and about 183 of the subscribers were present, including Lord Hotham, M.P., the Hon. G. Duncombe, M.P., the Hon. A. Duncombe, M.P., J. G. Smythe, Esq., M.P., &c. Sir G. Strickland presided. The portrait was presented to the worthy Baronet by the chairman in very feeling terms. The health of Sir Tatton Sykes was then drunk amidst enthusiastic cheering, and he afterwards returned thanks in an appropriate speech.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1850.

THE practice of awarding head-money for the capture and destruction of pirates, however prevalent it may be in European states, and however familiar to men's minds it may have become, is not one, we think, that can be justly defended. Brave and generous officers in the Navy do not need the incentive of blood-money to urge them to the fulfilment of their duty; and, were the present custom abolished, there can be no doubt, at least, as far as British officers are concerned—that quite as much zeal, energy, and discretion would be shown in the capture of the pirates that infest the Oriental and other seas, as are shown now or have ever been shown before. But this is a different question from that raised by the Aborigines Protection Society and the Peace Society in their meeting of Wednesday evening, at the London Tavern, although the giving of head-money naturally entered into the discussion. On the 10th of November last, and fully a fortnight before any other account reached England, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS published, with many illustrations taken on the spot, a narrative of the destruction of a piratical fleet off Borneo by a small British force under the orders of Sir James Brooke. The slaughter that took place was very great, the total loss of the pirates being estimated at 1500 men. The British force was aided in its operations by a body of native Borneans—as much interested as ourselves in the abolition of piracy and the punishment of pirates.

The statement in this Journal, bearing the signature of Mr. Urban Vigors, one of the officers engaged, was, that the result of the expedition was the destruction of the most piratical tribe on the north-west coast, under the most unequivocal circumstances of piracy; that they were intercepted on their return from a desperate foray, with hands red with the slaughter of innocent and unsuspecting traders. The publication excited much interest amongst all parties, and some indignation amongst the party that afterwards called the meeting of Wednesday evening, to comment upon and condemn the conduct of Rajah Brooke. Mr. Sturge denied that there was any danger to British commerce from piracy in those seas, and asserted, as did various other speakers, that at all events there was nothing stronger than a mere suspicion of piracy against the 1500 men destroyed by Rajah Brooke, and, consequently, that there was no justification of his conduct in killing so many men without proof of their guilt. The discussion narrows itself therefore to the question—were these men pirates or not? Mr. Vigors, writing from the spot, states distinctly that they were; and, while the point was mooted at the meeting, an unexpected visitor—who had himself commanded British vessels in those seas, and who had been engaged hand to hand with a piratical force—stated with equal distinctness and great energy, that there could be no doubt of the fact. His appearance somewhat disturbed the meeting; but, ultimately, a resolution was passed in deprecation of Rajah Brooke's proceedings, and of the practice of awarding head-money. The great question of our right to attack and kill pirates who attack and kill us whenever they have an opportunity, was prudently suffered to drop.

Rajah Brooke, we dare say, is as sorry as any of the estimable gentlemen who condemn his conduct, that he should have been instrumental in the death of so many fellow-creatures; but, if these men were really pirates, and it were a point of clear duty on his part to punish them, he may deplore the necessity under which he acted, and yet go to his bed at night with a clear conscience. With regard to the employment of savages as the allies of civilised men in a war with savages, we are of the opinion of the great Lord Chatham, that it cannot be justified. Men who cut off and smoke-dry the heads of their enemies, after a fight, in battle, are no fit allies for a civilised people. In this respect, and as regards head-money, the public sentiment will support Mr. Sturge and Mr. George Thompson in the opinions they expressed; but, as regards the unfortunate necessity of punishing piracy, we think public opinion is far more likely to go along with the gallant Captain Smith. If it be unjust to inflict the penalty of death against pirates and seamurderers—taken in the fact, and "with the red hand," as the old law expresses it—then we are not justified in the execution of our Thurtells and our Greenacres, our Tawells and our Mannings.

The King of Holland has formally given his consent to the marriage of the Princess Louisa of the Netherlands with the Prince Royal of Sweden and Norway. On this occasion a grand banquet and ball were given a few days ago to Count Bjornstjerna, aide-de-camp of the King of Sweden, sent to the Hague by the King and Queen of Sweden with letters soliciting the hand of the Princess. At the banquet the King of Holland proposed a toast to the happiness of the Royal pair, to the prosperity of the two Royal families, and the maintenance of friendly relations between the Netherlands and Sweden.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

There has been very little to vary the usually quiet tenor of Court life during the present week. The Privy Council, on Wednesday last, at which her Majesty's Speech on opening the session of Parliament was arranged and agreed upon, forms almost the only exception. The Court Newsman thus chronicles the incidents of the week:—

The Count and Countess de Neuilly, the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, and the Prince de Joinville, visited her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert on Friday last, and partook of luncheon with the Queen and Prince.

On Saturday, the Duchess of Kent dined with the Queen; and, on the following day, her Royal Highness, with her Majesty and the Prince Consort, attended Divine service in the private chapel of the Castle.

On Monday, Prince Albert went out shooting, the Duchess of Kent again joining the Royal circle at dinner in the evening.

On Tuesday, his Royal Highness also sported in the Royal preserves.

On Wednesday, after the Privy Council, the Duchess of Sutherland and Lady Constance Leveson Gower, arrived at the Castle, on a visit to the Queen and the Prince Consort.

The Royal dinner-party on Thursday evening included the Duchess of Kent, her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess of Hesse-Darmstadt, of Baden; his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar; the Duchess of Sutherland; Lady C. Leveson Gower; the Marquis and Marchioness of Douglas; the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter; Lady Fanny Howard; Baroness de Spaths; the Earl and Countess of Jersey; Lady Clementina Villiers; the Earl and Countess Spencer; Sir George Cowper, &c.

Her Majesty held a Privy Council on Wednesday at Windsor Castle. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert; the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord President; the Earl of Minto, Lord Privy Seal; Lord John Russell, First Lord of the Treasury; Sir George Grey, Secretary of State for the Home Department; Viscount Palmerston, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; Earl Grey, Secretary of State for the Colonies; Sir Charles Wood, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Sir John Hobhouse, President of the Board of Control; Lord Campbell, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere, President of the Board of Trade; the Earl of Carlisle, First Commissioner of the Woods and Forests; the Right Hon. Fox Maule, Secretary at War; the Marquis of Breadalbane, Lord Chamberlain, and the Duke of Norfolk, Master of the Horse. At the Council, an election was ordered for two Scotch peers, in the room of the Earl of Airlie and Lord Colville of Culross, deceased; the Queen's Speech on opening the session of Parliament was also arranged and agreed upon; after which Mr. Justice Talfourd was presented to the Queen as an audience, by the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, when Queen's counsel was conferred upon his appointment, and the honour of Knighthood conferred upon him by her Majesty. The Right Hon. Sir David Dundas, Judge Advocate General, had an audience of the Queen, and submitted to her Majesty the proceedings of some courts-martial. Her Majesty was attended by Lord Carneys, Lord in Waiting; and Major-General Sir Frederic Stovin, Groom in Waiting. After the Council, luncheon was served to the Ministers and Officers of State in attendance.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, on Monday, at Gloucester House.

The Grand Duchess Stephanie of Baden, we regret to say, has been, since her return from Scotland, severely indisposed, at the Marquis of Douglas's residence at Putney. Her Royal Highness has not been well enough to pay visits to any of the Royal family now in town.

His Royal Highness George, attended by Captain the Hon. James Macdonald, left town on Saturday for Dublin.

The Duke of Wellington arrived at Apsley House on Saturday, from Strathfieldsaye. The Marquis and Marchioness of Douro have also come to town from the noble and gallant Duke's seat.

We regret to learn that the Earl of Malmesbury has for some days been confined to his bed by rheumatic fever, and will be unable to attend his parliamentary duties at the meeting of the session.

The Earl and Countess of Stamford have arrived at Enville Hall, Staffordshire, from their town residence in Hill-street. The noble Earl intends to celebrate his arrival with his new bride by giving a ball to his tenants and gentlemen at the family seat.

Viscount and Viscountess Combermere and the Hon. Miss Cotton have arrived in town, from Combermere Abbey.

Lady Vernon will give a soirée dansante on Monday next.

Lord Brougham arrived in Grafton-street on Monday evening, from Paris.

His Excellency Count Kielmansegge arrived at the Hanoverian Legation on Friday, from Hanover, to resume his diplomatic duties, after an absence of nearly six months.

Lieutenant-General Sir William Gomm, K.C.B. (the late Governor of the Mauritius), arrived in London on Saturday evening, accompanied by Lady Gomm and suite, from Southampton, where the General's yacht awaited a long absence from his native country, disembarked on Saturday morning from the steamer from Alexandria.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lady Mary Wood had a dinner party on Saturday, at their residence in Downing-street.

We regret to state that, in consequence of a severe accident, Sir Augustus Clifford will be prevented from attending his duties at the House of Lords for a short time. Applications for admission may, however, during his absence, be made to Mr. Hayward, the Queen's Counsel.

FASHIONABLE AND POLITICAL ENTERTAINMENTS.

The First Lord of the Treasury gave a full-dress dinner on Wednesday evening, at his official residence in Downing-street, to the mover and seconder of the Address in the House of Commons, and a distinguished party of noblemen and gentlemen connected with the Government, holding seats in the Lower House. Her Majesty's Speech, on opening the session of Parliament, was read by Lord John Russell to the assembled guests. Later in the evening Lady John Russell had an assembly at the private residence of the Premier, in Chesham-place. After the leading members of the fashionable world paid their respects to her Ladyship on the occasion.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, as Lord President of the Council, entertained a distinguished party of peers on Wednesday evening at a full-dress dinner at Lansdowne House. Her Majesty's Speech was read to the guests by the noble President after the banquet.

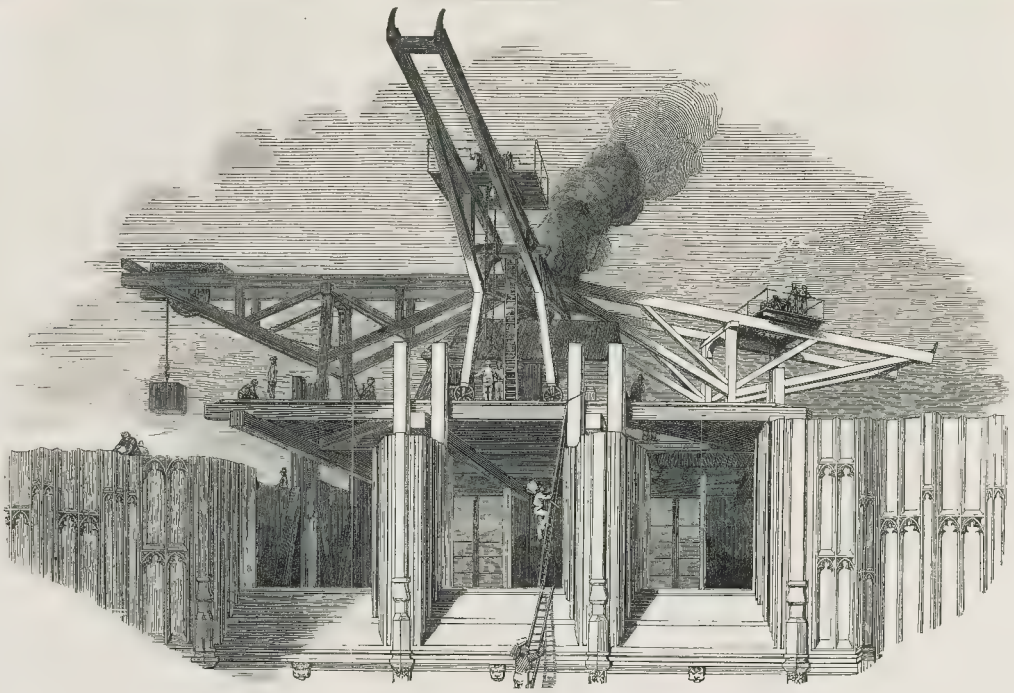
Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston entertained a distinguished party at dinner on Saturday evening, at their mansion in Carlton-terrace. The noble Viscountess had afterwards an assembly, at which nearly all the leading members of the political and fashionable world now in town were present.

Lord Stanley gave a magnificent banquet to a distinguished circle of Peers—supporters of the Conservative party—on Wednesday evening, at his mansion in St. James's-square.

The Baronness Brunnow commenced the fashionable season on Wednesday night with a grand ball at Ashburton House, given in celebration of the birthday of Count Nesselrode, the Russian Chancellor. The guests were very numerous, and dancing was prolonged until an advanced hour in the morning. Many of the distinguished persons present wore their official costumes, and the scene was altogether a very brilliant one, worthy of the taste of the munificent hostess and the interesting occasion which induced the festivity.

The total imports of tea into the United Kingdom in 1849 were 42,460,000 lb. against 45,100,000 lb. in 1848. The deliveries for home consumption were 50,196,000 lb., against 48,400,000 lb. in 1848. The foreign exports were considerably increased, being 2,500,000 lb. against 2,300,000 lb. in 1848. The stock in the United Kingdom on 31st December, 1849, is estimated at 42,500,000 lb. against 45,500,000 lb. in 1848, and 32,100,000 lb. in 1847.

Mr. Sir John Walmesley, M.P., for Preston, and Mr. Wm. Williams, late M.P. for Coventry, &c. The resolutions embodied the usual set of objects which the association has been formed to obtain, and were carried through with. Mr. G. Thompson gave to the meeting an account of his Parliamentary stewardship, and entered into some explanations as to the course he had pursued in reference to the local bill for renewing the leases of the Commercial-road Turnpike Trust, which appeared to be satisfactory to the meeting. In the course of his speech, the hon. gentleman referred to his recent tour through England with Sir Joshua Walmesley, and the reception they had everywhere met with from the Chartists, and then appealed to the meeting whether the Chartists were not deserving of their confidence. A hearty cheer following replied to his appeal. Mr. Thompson) hoped they would bury the hatchet of discord; and, for his own part, he would say, that, although advocating all the points of the Charter, he would take what he could get, and therefore agreed to all the National Reform Association, but without abandoning the Charter—(cheers) he would take all he could get, and he advised them to do the same, but by no means to give a receipt in full. (Cheers.) The hon. gentleman concluded by saying that the union he had witnessed at all those meetings proved to him that the hour was striking when their banners would wave triumphant over the prostrate tyranny under which the country had so long groaned.



PART OF THE VICTORIA TOWER—THE HOISTING-SCAFFOLD.

ELEVATION OF THE HOISTING-SCAFFOLD.

In Fig. 2 we give an elevation of the scaffold; N N being the walls of the tower, M M the guide-posts, and I I one of the cross-trusses. B is the hoisting traveller, A being the wheel over which the chain (D) from the windlass (K) passes. The traveller has a collar which encircles a hollow shaft (S), up which the chain (D) passes, thence over C, and on to A. The other travellers have similar collars, but have no chains communicating with the windlass (S); they have windlasses running on rails on them, as at K, so that stones and other material can be lifted, carried, and placed at any spot with the greatest precision and facility. J represents one of these carrying travellers; and at O O, on both the travellers, are the wheels of the tripels running on the circular rail. The perspective view of these machines in our general representation clearly shows their character. G G indicate where the shed over the steam-engine, &c. is erected; F, the stop to keep the windlass (K) from running off the rail; Q Q, the ends of main trusses.

In Fig. 3 is shown an elevation of the hoisting-screw, M M being the guide-posts, which are 12 inches in diameter; and Q is the end of one of the main trusses. L is the screw itself, 2¼ inches diameter; N N the screw-nut and carriage. The screw is acted upon by means of a winch; and, when the advanced state of the masonry renders it necessary to hoist the platform, the nuts and carriages are removed higher up the guide-posts; then the screws are worked up, carrying with them the platform, steam-engine, travellers, and everything upon them; the nut-head is then moved up to the required height, to aid in supporting the main and cross trusses, and remains there till the progress of the works renders a fresh lift necessary.

We should mention that there are eight hoisting-screws, two to each side of the platform.

Our Sectional Engravings are carefully prepared from the working drawings, and the View itself is taken with the utmost possible care; and we trust the brief notice we have given will enable our readers to appreciate one of those wonderful mechanical means of saving labour which so eminently distinguish the era of modern engineering; and enable such of our readers as may be fortunate enough to see the New Palace at Westminster, to understand the mode of working the singular machines which are in operation on its chiefest beauty—the Victoria Tower.

PROGRESS OF THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

HOISTING-SCAFFOLD OF THE VICTORIA TOWER.

Perhaps there are few mechanical contrivances employed in the various works at the New Palace, Westminster, of more interest than the novel and admirable scaffold used in the erection of that enormous and magnificent pile, the Victoria Tower. The singular appearance of the scaffold, viewed from all parts—seemingly nothing more than three huge cranes, and the perfectly easy manner in which they appear to work, are extremely striking and interesting, in addition to the circumstance that the exterior of the building is not disfigured during its progress by a forest of scaffold-poles, stretching their gaunt limbs in every direction. This latter point is of itself of great importance; as, from the interest with which the progress of the Houses of Parliament is watched, it is a little addition to the pleasure of seeing so glorious a range of buildings in progress, to be enabled to note the gradual development of the design freed from all incumbrances.

ELEVATION OF THE HOISTING-SCREW.

From our Illustrations a complete idea of the character of the hoisting-scaffold can be formed; and to them we now proceed to refer. In the diagram, Fig. 1 is a plan of the Victoria Tower, taken at the base of the first tier of windows; A, A, A, A being the octagonal turrets at the angles, and in which are the staircases leading to the top of the tower; and B, B, B, B, the spaces between the windows. On each side, within the walls, and close to the spaces between the windows, are four guide-posts, to which are securely fixed, by bolts, the raising screws—shown in Fig. 3 by means of which the main and cross trusses (C C and D D) which carry the platform, can be raised as the work proceeds; and thus, as the masonry is carried up, so is the whole mass of scaffold raised, six feet at a time. The diverging, horizontal, and vertical lines in the plan show the planks which compose the floor of the platform; and handrails are placed, as safeguards to the workmen, as a a a a a a a a. On the floor a circular rail is fixed, as at E E E E, and on this the hoisting and other travellers run, and by them all the requisite materials can be delivered at any part of the tower. In the centre of the platform is a windlass (G), worked by a steam-engine at F, which draws up, by means of the hoisting traveller, the materials from the works below, and deposits them on a portion of the tower, whence they are taken by the other travellers to their destined places; for we should observe that the hoisting traveller is not intended to move quite round the tower, but only to take in one-half of it in its movements, as its simple duty is to raise, and it is only on the south and west fronts that such work can be performed, the east and north fronts being attached to the main building.

PLAN OF THE VICTORIA TOWER.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

Thursday being the day appointed for the opening of the session of Parliament by commission, the west end of the town presented, about noon, a more animated appearance than for some time past, although, of course, the streets were not so crowded as they would have been if her Majesty had attended in person. Previous to one o'clock, the members of both Houses began to arrive; and before the appearance of the Commissioners, the galleries, and every portion of the House to which strangers are admitted, were completely filled with those who were anxious to witness the proceedings.

Shortly after two o'clock, the Lords Commissioners took the seats which had been appointed for them, when the Lord Chancellor desired the Deputy Usher of the Black Rod to summon the Commons to hear her Majesty's commission read.

A few minutes afterwards a great number of the members of the Lower House, headed by the Chief Clerk, appeared at the bar, when the Lord Chancellor desired the latter-patrnt, authorising the Lords Commissioners to open Parliament, in the name and on behalf of her Majesty, to be read, which having been done, his Lordship then read—

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"We are commanded by her Majesty to assure you that her Majesty has great satisfaction in again having recourse to the advice and assistance of her Parliament.

"The decease of her Majesty Queen Adelaide has caused her Majesty deep affliction. The extensive charity and exemplary virtues of her late Majesty will always render her memory dear to the nation.

"Her Majesty happily continues in peace and amity with Foreign Powers.

"In the course of the autumn, differences of a serious character arose between the Governments of Austria and Russia on the one hand, and the Sublime Porte on the other, in regard to the treatment of a considerable number of persons, who, after the termination of the civil war in Hungary, had taken refuge in the Turkish territory.

"Explanations which took place between the Turkish and Imperial Governments have fortunately removed any danger to the peace of Europe which might have arisen out of these differences.

"Her Majesty having been appealed to on this occasion by the Sultan, united her efforts with those of the Government of France, to which a similar appeal had been made, in order to assist, by the employment of her good offices, in effecting an amicable settlement of those differences in a manner consistent with the dignity and independence of the Porte.

"Her Majesty has been engaged in communications with foreign states, upon the measures which might be rendered necessary by the relaxation of the restrictions formerly imposed by the Navigation Laws of this country.

"The Governments of the United States of America and of Sweden have promptly taken steps to secure to British ships in the ports of their respective countries advantages similar to those which their own ships now enjoy in British ports.

"With regard to those Foreign States whose Navigation Laws have hitherto been of a restrictive character, her Majesty has received from nearly all of them assurances which induce her to hope that our example will speedily lead to a great and general elimination of those obstacles which previously existed to a free intercourse by sea between the nations of the world.

"In the summer and autumn of the past year, the United Kingdom was again visited by the ravages of the cholera; but Almighty God, in his mercy, was pleased to arrest the progress of mortality, and to stay this fearful pestilence. Her Majesty is persuaded that we shall best evince our gratitude by vigilant precautions against the more obvious causes of sickness, and an enlightened consideration for those who are most exposed to its attacks.

"Her Majesty, in her late visit to Ireland, derived the highest gratification from the loyalty and attachment manifested by all classes of her subjects. Although the effects of former years of scarcity are painfully felt in that part of the United Kingdom, they are mitigated by the present abundance of food, and the tranquillity which prevails.

"Her Majesty has great satisfaction in congratulating you on the improved condition of commerce and manufactures. It is with regret that her Majesty has observed the complaints which in many parts of the kingdom have proceeded from the holders and occupiers of land. Her Majesty greatly laments that any portion of her subjects should be suffering distress. But it is a source of sincere gratification to her Majesty to witness the increased enjoyment of the necessaries and comforts of life, which cheapness and plenty have bestowed upon the great body of her people.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

"Her Majesty has directed the estimates for the year to be laid before you. They have been framed with a strict regard to economy, while the efficiency of the various branches of the public service has not been neglected.

"Her Majesty has seen with satisfaction the present state of the revenue.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"Some of the measures which were postponed at the end of the last session, for want of time for their consideration, will be again laid before you. Among the most important of these is one for the better government of the Australian Colonies.

"Her Majesty has directed various measures to be prepared for the improvement of the condition of Ireland. The mischiefs arising from party processions, the defects of the laws regulating the relations of landlord and tenant, the imperfect state of the Grand Jury Acts, and the diminished number of electors for members to serve in Parliament, will, together with other matters of serious consequence, form the subjects of measures to be submitted for your consideration.

"Her Majesty has learnt with satisfaction, that the measures which have been already passed for the promotion of the public health are in a course of gradual adoption; and her Majesty trusts that, both in the metropolis and in various parts of the United Kingdom, you will be enabled to make further progress in the removal of evils which affect the health and well-being of her subjects.

"The favour of Divine Providence has hitherto preserved this kingdom from the wars and convulsions which, during the last two years, have shaken so many of the states of the continent of Europe. It is her Majesty's hope and belief, that, by combining liberty with order, by preserving what is valuable, and amending what is defective, you will sustain the fabric of our institutions, as the abode and the shelter of a free and happy people."

At the conclusion of the reading of the Speech, the Lords Commissioners and the Speaker and Members of the House of Commons retired, and their Lordships adjourned to five o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships re-assembled at five o'clock.

LAW OF BANKRUPTCY.

Lord BROUGHAM introduced a Bill to amend the Law of Bankruptcy.

SCOTCH REPRESENTATIVE PEERS.

The Duke of RICHMOND drew the attention of their Lordships to the fact that there were two vacancies in the Scotch Representative Peers.

The Marquess of LANSDOWNE was understood to say that he was not responsible for the vacancies not being filled up.

After a few words from the Earl of Eglinton, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Duke of Argyle, Lord Stanley, and Lord Redesdale, the subject dropped.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE introduced a Bill for regulating Select Vestries.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.—ADDRESS AND AMENDMENT.

The Royal Speech having been read in the usual form,

The Earl of ESSEX rose to move the Address. Since they had met last the country had had the misfortune to lose the Dowager Queen Adelaide, and he was sure their Lordships would sympathise with her Majesty in the grief which she felt for that great loss, for never had any foreign Princess secured the good opinion of this country to a greater degree than Queen Adelaide. The interference of her Majesty's Government on behalf of Turkey, in the differences which had arisen between that country and Russia, was a legitimate exercise of the influence of this country, and had been attended with the most happy effects. He could not but recollect that during the last two years the whole of Europe had been in a state of disorder; scarcely a post arrived that did not bring the intelligence of the overthrow of some ancient dynasty. During the whole of these convulsions this country had remained undisturbed; and he attributed the state of tranquillity mainly to the manner in which the Queen's influence had given way to public opinion. The artizan and operative classes had, to their honour, shown themselves superior to the temptations held out to them. A tribute of gratitude was due to the public press, the members of which, however they might differ as to the means, had but one object in view, to secure the prosperity and the tranquillity of the country. (Hear, hear.) When he looked back to the events of the last few years, he could not but consider that it was a most fortunate circumstance that they had had at the head of affairs, during the time which preceded the Continental revolutions, men who had had the sagacity to repeal the laws which prohibited the importation of food. Of all the votes he had ever given, there was none to which he looked back with greater satisfaction, than to the vote he had given in favour of the repeal of the laws preventing their free importation of food. The late pestilence had drawn the attention of the public to the state of the sanitary laws, and every one was convinced that those laws must be amended. The improved state of the commerce and trade of the country proved the soundness of the alterations which had been recently made in the laws regulating the imports of this country. It was satisfactory to know that the measures which had last session been passed with regard to Ireland, more particularly the Encumbered Estates Bill, had worked well. No one could regret more than he did the distress under which the agricultural interests were suffering, but he was convinced it was of a temporary nature. (Cheering, and counter-cheering.) He believed that those who had kept up a Protectionist agitation—who called themselves farmers' friends—had acted most unwisely. (Cheers, and counter-cheers.) He had received a statement from the vestry-clerk of Marylebone parish, stating that there had been a saving of £11,000 in the rates, in consequence of the cheapness of food; in another metropolitan parish the saving had been £7000, and the rates had been reduced twopence in the pound. (Loud cheers.) The repeal of the Navigation-laws had been followed by the most happy effects. Shipbuilding had increased, and there were now orders from foreign countries for the building of ships in this country. (Hear, hear.) He knew not what might be the measures to be proposed with regard to the Australian colonies, but he hoped that the time was not far distant when more liberty as regards internal legislation would be granted to all our colonies. The noble Earl concluded by moving the Address, which was an echo to the Speech.

Lord METHUEN, in seconding the Address, said it must be a matter of congratulation to see the efforts of the Government to prevent the occurrence of hostilities between Russia and Turkey had been attended with success. It was also matter of congratulation that the manufacturing and commercial interests were in a state of prosperity. He regretted that he could not say the same as regarded the agriculture, interest; that interest was suffering from party excited by the Protectionist agitation. But it should be recollected that under Protection, in 1822, the price of corn had been lower than it was at present, and again in 1835. The noble Lord concluded by formally seconding the motion.

The Earl of STRADBROKE felt that he should be wanting in his duty, if he abstained from embracing this, the earliest opportunity, of declaring to their Lordships the existence of deep and great agricultural distress. He believed that the distress would be permanent so long as the present system of legislation should continue. In 1815 it was considered that the British agriculturist would be swamped by foreign importation, unless he had protection, and in consequence the Corn-Law measure of 1815 was introduced. He admitted that under Protection great distress had existed in 1842. He well remembered the severe distress that existed throughout the agricultural districts at this period. Many landowners retired to the Continent under pretence of educating their families, but really to retrench; and many industrious farmers and labourers were reduced to the workhouse. The measure of 1828 was introduced at a time when there was no great dread of a large importation of foreign corn, and he believed that measure was one of the wisest ever submitted to Parliament. (Protectionist cheers.) In 1834 a new measure was introduced, which was a most just measure. Its effect was to increase the comfort and well-being of the labouring classes. From the end of 1835 was the most abundant ever known, and the natural result was that prices fell, and great distress was the consequence of that fall of price. He was shocked to find so that many persons endeavoured to establish an analogy between the low prices of 1835 and those of 1849. Their cases had nothing in common—there was no analogy between the two cases. In that year the exports amounted to £53,000,000, whereas in 1849, the year of another alteration in the Corn-Law, it only amounted to £43,000,000: and yet in the year 1842 the Corn-Laws were relaxed. In the year 1845 the Corn-Laws were repealed, and an enormous importation took place, which had continued up to the present hour. It was this enormous importation which had reduced the price of agricultural produce, and not a superabundant harvest, as had been the case in 1835. This cause of agricultural distress would continue so long as the existing laws continued; and he should therefore propose an amendment, to the effect that the agricultural distress at present existing was aggravated by the local taxation and the existing state of the law.

The Earl of DESART supported the amendment, because he considered that an attempt had been made to pass over agricultural distress by putting prominently forward the fact of the existence of commercial prosperity.

The Earl of CARLISLE opposed the amendment of the noble Earl. No one could doubt of the great distress that prevailed among the owners and occupiers of land; and her Majesty in her Speech did not only regret it, but greatly lamented it; but he doubted very much whether the course proposed to be pursued by the noble Earl who had moved the amendment. He believed, if the amendment was carried, it would have the effect of carrying through the length and breadth of the land the delusion that Parliament was ready to reconsider what it had done, and alter it. There were the same forebodings of distress on the part of the agriculturists if the average price of corn should be below 80s.; those forebodings had been proved to be groundless, as he believed the present forebodings would prove. He was entirely dependent upon land, and therefore he could not be supposed to be indifferent to the question. He believed the distress would be temporary. Even when they were basking in the full sunshine in 1838 prices were lower than they were now; and notwithstanding those prices were attributable solely, as had been admitted by the noble Earl, to a plentiful harvest, the cries of distress put forth by the agriculturists were little less loud than at present. It had been determined to give the experiment of Free-Trade a fair trial. It had been tried not quite a year, and during that period never had there been so many exceptional causes in operation affecting the price of corn. There was the famine in Ireland, and the revolutionary outbreak in Europe; and with regard to the seasons, it was a moot point whether the distress was owing to the short harvest of 1847, or to the plentiful harvest which followed it. The experiment had not had a fair trial; we were in an exceptional state, and not in a situation to pronounce upon the success of the experiment. His own impression was not one of despondence; but, if even he were convinced that the average of corn would never be one farthing higher, he was not prepared to revert to a system of Protection (hear, hear), because he was not prepared to deprive the people of those sources, which, to quote the words of the Speech, "cheapness and plenty had diffused amongst them." Many towns, whose prosperity had seemed departing, had had that prosperity revived in consequence of the cheapness and plenty of food. The poor-rates had also been reduced. The number of persons on the 1st of January, 1850, as compared with the 1st of January, 1849, was 7 per cent. less throughout the whole of England. and this diminution was not confined to the manufacturing districts; in Cheshire the decrease was 11 per cent.; Bucks, 7 per cent.; Cumberland, 11 per cent.; and in Dorsetshire, 7 per cent. The largest diminution was in Lancashire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, and in Nottinghamshire. In Ireland, the expense of maintaining paupers in the workhouse had been reduced from 9*s.* 1*d.* per head, which it was last year, to 1*s.* 1*d.* a head this year. He could not, therefore, be a party to any measure which would check the cheapness and plenty of food, which was so well calculated to promote the comfort and happiness of the people. The Protectionist complaint, reduced to its elements, was this—that there was too much to eat in the country. (Cheering and counter-cheering.) If there was not too much to eat, causing too great cheapness, where was the complaint? (Cheers.) It had been said that the abolition of Protection would throw land out of cultivation, but such was not the case, for, during the last autumn, a greater breadth of wheat had been sown than had been ever before known, and there were no less than seventy-three applications for enclosures of land. If corn was not too cheap and too abundant, what was the accusation against Free-Trade? (Hear, hear.) It had not sent bullion out of the country—it had not diminished our trade—it had not thrown land out of cultivation; and the only accusation that could be brought against it was, that it had made food too plenty and too cheap. He believed that there were many, even close to their Lordships' House, who would prove the falsity of the assertion that food was too plenty or too cheap; and he would rather forfeit his place in their Lordships, House, than consent to a policy which would make food scarce and dear. He hoped their Lordships would negative the amendment by a large majority (Cheers.)

After some observations from the Duke of RICHMOND, Earl FITZWILLIAM, and Earl WINCHILSEA,

Lord BROUGHAM said, though he did not consider agricultural distress at all exaggerated, he d.sapproved in the strongest manner the language which had been used at certain Protectionist meetings. A great deal had also been said as to the distress existing in certain classes of the community, and emigration had been proposed as a means of alleviating it, though he did not think it would be attended with the anticipated result. The noble and learned Lord concluded by stating that having seen no cause why they should retrace their steps, he was unable to vote for the amendment proposed by the noble Earl.

Lord STANLEY having remarked on the cordial assent which certain portions of the Speech would meet from all classes of the community, and especially those portions which related to the death of the Queen Dowager and to the visitation of the cholera, turned to those sentiments which did not meet with his approbation. Considering the coolness which had arisen between England and Russia on the Turkish question, he was surprised that her Majesty had been made to say that she was at peace and amity with all other nations; and with regard to agricultural distress, he was convinced that it could only be alleviated by a return to moderate protection. He and his friends had been invited to say what they desired, and he made no secret of his own views. He believed a moderate protecting duty would be advantageous to agriculture and to the revenue, while it would not be injurious to the consumer. He did not ask them, their Lordships to interrupt the progress of that great experiment which he feared was leading inevitably to the most serious consequences. He only asked them, and he asked them with confidence, not to refuse their assent to the amendment, which affirmed that there were two causes for the distress of the agricultural interest—causes with which it was the function of the Government to deal; and they were entitled to say that in one shape or other the Government was bound to take some steps for the removal of that distress.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE defended the Royal Speech from the objections raised by Lord Stanley, and advised the House to support the Address, and throw out the amendment.

The Duke of BEAUFORT bore testimony to the great distress existing among the agricultural labourers.

Earl GREY denied that he had ever said that his rents would be increased by a repeal of the Corn-laws. What he had said was that he believed his property would be increased in value by the repeal, and he believed so still, because it was impossible that the condition of the country could be improved without increasing the value of all property.

Their Lordships then divided, when there appeared—

The Address was then agreed to, and was ordered to be carried up by the Lords with white staves.

Their Lordships then adjourned at quarter after one until Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The House met this day at two o'clock, and the SPEAKER and members present having been summoned to the House of Lords to hear her Majesty's Speech read, the SPEAKER proceeded for that purpose to the House of Peers. On his return, the Speech was read, and the House adjourned until a quarter to four o'clock.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair at a quarter to four o'clock.

Several new members took the oaths and their seats.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM read a letter from Major-General Shadwell, acknowledging the vote of thanks passed by that House to the army in India.—The letter was moved to be entered on the minutes.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES.

Mr. TUFNELL said it might be convenient to the House to state that it was the intention of her Majesty's Government, on Monday next, to move the introduction of a bill for the better government of the Australian Colonies, when an explanation would be given of the colonial policy of that country.

On Wednesday the Solicitor-General would move to bring in a Bill to amend the practice of the Courts of Common Law in Ireland; to amend the practice of the Court of Chancery; and also the law affecting judgments.

On Monday next the Under-Secretary for the Colonies would move the appointment of a committee respecting the affairs of the Island of Cyprus.

On Tuesday next the Secretary for Ireland would move the introduction of a Bill to Restrain Party Processions in Ireland. (Cheers).

The Chancellor of the Exchequer would bring in a Bill at an early day, to provide for the better government of the Woods and Forests, and of the land revenues of the Crown.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department would bring in a Bill for the better Discipline of Gaols and Prisons in that country.

On Tuesday next, the President of the Board of Trade would move the introduction of a Bill for improving the Condition of the Masters, Mates, and Seamen employed in the Merchant Service.

The Secretary for Ireland would also bring in a bill to amend the law relating to the Registration of Parliamentary Voters, and the Shortening the Duration of Parliaments in Ireland. (Roars of laughter from all parts of the House, the hon. gentleman having evidently mis-stated the title of the bill, which was to hasten the time of taking the votes.)

Mr. SLANEY gave notice that, on Monday next, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Savings-Banks. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.")

At half-past four, the mover and seconder of the Address entered the house—the former (Mr. Villiers) in Deputy-Lieutenant's uniform, and the latter (Sir James Duke) in full court dress. They were both received with cheers, and took their seats beand the ministerial bench.

On behalf of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, notice was given of the appointment of a committee to revise the Army and Ordnance expenditure.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.—THE ADDRESS AND AMENDMENT.

Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne having been read by the Speaker,

Mr. C. P. VILLIERS rose to move the adoption of the Address in answer to her Majesty's gracious Speech. After praying the indulgence of the House, he observed that he was a strenuous advocate of that system of commercial policy in the carrying out of which he had borne his humble part. He had the most implicit reliance in his noble friend at the head of the Government that he would do nothing to compromise that policy, and that he would maintain entire the measures which he believed were most important to the well-being and happiness of the people of this empire. Under these circumstances he had no hesitation in asking that House to respond to the Speech from the Throne. The hon. gentleman then referred to the recent bereavement her Majesty had sustained in the death of the Queen Dowager, and drew a well-merited tribute to the virtues of the late Queen, whose unobtrusive piety and universal benevolence had produced the deepest feelings of respect and attachment among all classes. He next referred to the interference of this country in the affairs of Austria and Hungary, expressing gratification that the intervention of England had had its effect of putting an end to hostilities between two neighbouring states, a result which was mainly owing to the high position which the country had always maintained in the opinion of the world. At the same time, it could not be too generally known, that this country had no unfriendly or ambitious designs towards other nations, and had no wish whatever to take any advantage of their confidence or their weaknesses. (Hear, hear.) He then referred to the repeal of the Navigation Laws, observing that that interest (the shipping interest), which it was supposed would be the most seriously affected by the change, was at present in a state of the greatest activity. (Cheers.) Whether he referred to the Tyne or the Thames, the Wear or the Clyde, the prospects of the shipowners were never more cheering or gratifying. He then referred to her Majesty's recent visit to Ireland, from which he anticipated the most beneficial results. That visit was not surprised at the enthusiasm and loyalty of her reception in that country, as her Majesty had always evinced the greatest interest in their welfare, and the greatest desire that equal justice and equal favour should be awarded in Ireland. The returns with regard to out and in-door relief, and to crime in Ireland, showed a marked improvement in both respects. As regarded England, he believed it would be universally admitted, that both the trade and commerce of the country were never in a more satisfactory state. He was satisfied that the adoption of the principles of Free-Trade by that country had been productive of the most beneficial results to the working-classes of England. (Cheers.) He believed further, that the scrupulous of the Protectionists, as they were called, had been entirely falsified. (A laugh). He would call upon the world at large to judge between the two systems. (Cheers from the opposition benches.) There was not one single thing that had been said by the Protectionists that had come true; and not a thing that had been anticipated by the advocates of Free-Trade that had not been realised. (Great laughter and cheering.) It could not be denied that the whole of the manufacturing districts were, at the present moment, fully employed, and the cheapness of the necessaries of life was such as to place them in a much better position than they had been for a considerable period. There had been a considerable diminution in the amount of public relief given—the poor-rates having been much lower last year than during several previous years. There had also been a large addition to the ordinary amount of bullion in the Bank; and he appealed to his right hon. friend, whether the revenue of the country was not considerably increased. Why, they had a sum of two millions beyond the revenue of the previous year: the income had exceeded the expenditure, and that was a matter of not very usual occurrence of late years. (A laugh.) Was it nothing that the poor of this country had an abundant supply of food at a reasonable price? Why, from accurate calculations that he had made, he estimated the difference in the money paid for food in this country in 1847 and 1849 at not less than 91 millions sterling, viz. 61 millions in grain, and 30 millions in other articles of food imported at a considerable reduction in the price. (Cheers, and cries of "On.") He would now pass to another topic referred to in her Majesty's Speech, namely, the complaints of distress that had reached her from the agricultural districts. He assured the House that he, for one, sincerely sympathised with that distress, and he was aware that some of the farmers and landed proprietors were suffering distress. (Loud cheers.) He had never disguised the fact that the change would probably be productive of some suffering, but the difficulty was to know how to apply any legislative relief. Many trials had been made, but he did not think that any of them had succeeded in relieving the agriculturist, nor was he aware that they could claim any exemption on account of local burdens. In every instance in which Parliament had attempted to relieve the occupier, the benefit had invariably been transferred to the owner, who, by additional rent, made up for any reduction in the local burdens of the land. The hon. gentleman then referred to the various legislative enactments that had been made with regard to the Corn-laws—contending that they were always in the habit of coming to that House for relief, and always complaining; and yet, never finding any relief. At all the recent meetings of agriculturists in England, it was unanimously agreed that it was impossible for the farmer to grow wheat at a profit at 40s. a bushel. He believed, in the long run, it would be found that the farmers of that country would be enabled to grow wheat at a profit at 40s. a bushe.; but even if that were so, he did not think that House would be justified in making an additional tax upon the food of the people. (Cheers.) The hon. gentleman then read a letter from a Gloucestershire farmer, shewing that he was enabled, in consequence of the advantageous terms he had paid for his land, to grow wheat at a profit, and at 40s. a quarter. He did not think the conditions were at all hard for the landlord; and it was, in his opinion, the fault of the farmers and landlords themselves, who were unwilling to make arrangements corresponding with the altered circumstances of the country. He believed there was as great a demand for land at the present moment as there had ever been; that the prices of land were equally high; and that the condition of the agriculturist was as good as it had been for many years. There was no advantage which the farmer abroad had over the home producer, beyond the high price of land; that, however, was a matter which the farmer had under his own control. If the land of this country was properly managed, he believed in his heart that enough of corn could be grown in England and England to feed the entire, and even a much larger population than they at present had. He did not attribute the distress of the landed proprietors of Ireland; but it would appear as if a great retribution had fallen upon the owners of land in that country, and that the regeneration of Ireland would ultimately be found to date from the visitation of Providence with which it had been afflicted. The large supplies of corn that England had received from abroad was the main cause that that country was not reduced to the same deplorable condition as Ireland. He entertained the most sanguine hopes of the future regeneration of Ireland; and when the effects of the commercial freedom they had recently obtained were more fully developed, and added to the political and religious freedom they already enjoyed, they might hope to see that great country as flourishing and prosperous as she once was. (Cheers.) The hon. gentleman concluded by moving the Address, which was, as usual, an echo of the Speech, and resumed his seat amidst loud cheers

Sir James Duke rose to offer a few observations by way of willingness to second the Address, after the very able and eloquent speech they had just heard. It was with great reluctance, from a consciousness of his inability, that he had undertaken the task of seconding the Address. He felt, however, that it was a compliment paid to the position he held as one of the Members of the City of London, rather than to any merits or claims of his own; and he was rejoiced to have an opportunity of declaring his cordial adherence to the policy of the noble Lord at the head of the Government and his colleagues. He congratulated the House upon the position which that country occupied, after passing through an ordeal of no ordinary difficulty. He congratulated it also upon the prosperous state in which the commercial and manufacturing classes were at present, although he regretted that that prosperity had not extended to the agricultural classes. At the same time, he did not think that any legislative measure could be devised by that House would afford them any real or substantial relief: that must be looked for in renewed energy on their parts, and a different arrangement between the occupiers and the owners of land. He held in his hand a return from the Governor of Newgate, shewing that the number of committals in the last year were much lower than in the preceding one; and, in addition to that, he found that the manufacturing districts and the operatives were fully employed at good wages, and with a low price of food. At no period since the passing of Free-Trade measures had this country made such progress in prosperity as during the last few months; and he sincerely hoped that that prosperity would soon be extended to the agricultural classes. Her Majesty, in the course of her Speech, congratulated herself on the cessation of the cholera, and he believed that among every class throughout the country would readily participate. An extension of the suffrage in Ireland was one of the measures recommended by her Majesty; and upon that subject he should only express a hope that England also would be included in any measure framed for the attainment of that object. With respect to the repeal of the Navigation Laws, he was happy to be able to assure the House that at no period within his recollection was there greater activity observable than at the present, in our dockyards. The hon. Baronet concluded by thanking the House for the patience with which they had listened to him, and by expressing a hope that her Majesty might long continue to reign over such a happy and contented people. (Cheers.)

The Speaker having then read the Address, which was, as usual, an echo of the Speech from the Throne,

Sir J. Trollope rose to propose the addition of a few words to the Address, by way of amendment. On behalf of a numerous body of his friends, he felt it his duty, in concurrence with his hon. friends around him, to adopt that course. He sympathised most fully in the assurances of regret expressed by her Majesty at the recent loss of that distinguished statesman, the late Sir Robert Peel. It was stated in her Majesty's Speech, that her Majesty had received, on the occasion of her late visit to Ireland, the reception which she might naturally have expected from the warm-hearted people of that country; and he was sure they had heard that statement with unmixed gratification. There was also an allusion to the prosperous state of the manufactures of this country, as well as to the complaints which had issued from the agricultural body. Now, it should be observed, that those complaints had proceeded from almost every district in England and Scotland. It was true that while the agriculturists of Ireland were also reduced to great distress and embarrassment, they had not joined in the cry which had resounded throughout part of Great Britain upon the subject; but that fact was, he believed, to be attributed to the all-engrossing interest felt in Ireland with respect to the Poor-law and the unhappy social condition of the people. Among the agricultural body in England, however, a general if not a universal feeling prevailed that their case was one which claimed the earnest and immediate consideration of Parliament. He candidly confessed that he did not think that they had been complained to without cause in respect which they merited; and he was sorry to perceive that in the Speech from the Throne they were treated with a real, if not a studied, appearance of censure or indifference. It had been said that the agricultural distress was mainly to be attributed to the want of a proper cultivation of the soil; that reproach did not apply to the north of England, where every acre of productive land was most carefully cultivated. Great expense was being every day incurred for that purpose; and yet they complained of the unequal pressure of the agricultural body in that portion of the country. The House should remember that it was the poorer and the most industrious agriculturists who suffered most from the change in the system which they and their fathers were connected. Under these circumstances, he wished to submit to the House the following addition to the Address after the words "commerce and manufactures:" "But humbly to represent to your Majesty that we believe the interest of the United Kingdom, and especially in Ireland, the classes engaged in the cultivation of the soil are subject to severe distress, which in our opinion is to be attributed to recent legislation, and that such distress is aggravated by the heavy pressure of local taxation." (Cheers from the Protectionist members.)

Colonel Chatterton seconded the amendment. As an Irishman, he felt bound particularly to notice the distress which prevailed among the agricultural body in that portion of the United Kingdom with which he was more particularly connected. That distress extended to all classes, embracing landowners, farmers, and labourers; and he knew no subject which more urgently called for the consideration of Parliament.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he felt bound to congratulate his hon. friend who had moved the amendment on the moderation of language which he had observed in submitting his views to the House; and he also felt glad that his hon. friend had brought that question before them in a manner which would call for a direct decision on their part upon the great interests involved in the matter. There could be no doubt that trade and manufactures were at present in a state of great activity and prosperity; and that was a most important circumstance in considering the character of the policy they had to take adopted; for it is impossible that such extensive commerce and industry could be produced without a considerable amount of capital having been created. (Hear, hear.) The value of exports for the last three years, he believed, was as follows:—1847, £51,000,000; 1848, £48,946,000; and 1849, £58,848,000; and that great increase embraced not the great articles of our national manufactures. It was clear, therefore, that very foolish apprehensions had once existed in the minds of Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had said that although the amount of our exports increased, the goods exported had been sold at such reduced prices that the trade was in reality no gainer. Now, as to the reduction of prices, although in the first place that had been manufacturers themselves were the best judges of their own interests, and that they were not likely to sell their goods without a fair profit. But he found that, in every great article of manufacture, the prices which we had obtained last year had been higher than those obtained in the preceding year. Then, again, he was happy to be able to inform the House that in Sunderland, Liverpool, and all our great ship-building ports, the amount of ships at present being built was much larger than it had been at any former period. Foreign nations were anxiously looking to the result of the Free-Trade experiment in this country; and he had no doubt but that if that experiment should be found to be successful, it would be generally imitated by all the great nations of the world. He did not deny that great distress existed among the agricultural classes; and he admitted that that distress was, in some measure, to be attributable to the sudden change in our commercial policy. (Hear.) But he felt confident in the ability of the agriculturists of England to meet the competition to which they were at present exposed. He had never said, and he had never thought, that such a measure as the repeal of the Corn-laws could be carried into effect without great and serious disadvantages inseparable from all great changes of that description. At the same time, however, he believed that the true remedy for these disadvantages was to be found in the energies and the exertions of the parties, whose interests were so affected, to the altered circumstances in which they had been placed. He should further remind the House, that the poorer members of the agricultural classes themselves must have been benefited by the fall in the prices of articles of consumption, while it must manifestly have been one of the greatest of blessings to the community at large. Let not honourable gentlemen opposite forget that great variations and great falls in the prices of corn had taken place under the Protective system. He believed that the recent reduction in prices was not to be attributed solely to the repeal of the Corn-laws. A gentleman of great intelligence, who had devoted the utmost possible attention to that subject, had calculated that the produce of the last harvest had been thirty per cent. greater than the produce of the preceding year. Then again he found that in France, in which there had been no change in the laws affecting the sale of corn, the produce of the present year, as compared with the preceding year, had been greater than it had been in England. For his part, he believed that corn could not continue at its recent low prices in this country; for he had no doubt of the fall to passing and accidental circumstances. The importation of foreign corn into this country during the last seven months had constantly declined, in consequence, he had reason to believe, of the increase of prices among us, which rendered it impossible for foreigners to sell their corn at a profit in our markets. The farmers ought, therefore, to allow themselves to be intimidated by these predictions of ruin with which they had been threatened. There had been a time when the farmers had believed that they could not cultivate their land with a profit, except at a rent less than 80s. a quarter; that was in the year 1815, but prices had since been considerably below that amount, and yet land still continued to be cultivated, and the rental of land had considerably increased. The fact was that there was not one county in England, stated by the income-tax returns, in which the rental had not been increased since the year 1815, when it had been thought that agriculture could not be carried on with any profit with the prices of 80s. below 80s. He confessed that he saw no reason why a similar result should not follow under our altered commercial system. He entirely agreed with his hon. friend, that if the farmers could not cultivate their land with a profit, it was clear they should be allowed to do so; but if they could not, then the people were entitled to obtain it elsewhere, and on the most advantageous terms they could. Those who had not capital, energy, or industry, would no doubt suffer; but was it to be tolerated that the community should be made to suffer for those who had neither skill, energy, industry, or capital? He regretted that so much intemperate language had been used out of doors on the subject, and that gentlemen in that House had been induced to express opinions of a delusive kind with respect to the effects of Free-Trade. He had felt it his duty to make inquiries with respect to the state of agriculture in Scotland, and he was informed that in several instances farms had been taken at rents higher than those which had previously existed, and it could be supposed that the intelligent and skilful farmers of that country took those farms intending not to pay any rent? He had also seen a letter from the High Sheriff of Norfolk, from which it appeared that that gentleman had, despite of Free-Trade, realised his rent, and on lands in his own possession 10 per cent. on his live stock, &c., besides; and if one gentleman could do that, he did not see why another should not; and so long as he saw such examples, he never would despair. He believed that many of the agricultural population had experienced great benefit from the repeal of the Corn-laws; and that many of the agriculturists labourers had been kept out of the Union, and been able to support themselves in consequence of the moderate price of food. He now came to what he considered, after all, the great consideration in this question. He meant the question of employment; and he was happy to say that throughout the entire kingdom, and in the agricultural districts, as well as the manufacturing, there had been a great diminution of the number of paupers. He found that in the county of Sussex, the Earl of Chichester stated, at quarter sessions held on the 8th inst., he congratulated his brethren on the subject, that the number of able-bodied paupers had greatly diminished, and that there was plenty of agricultural employment in the county, if farmers possessed capital to carry on necessary improvements. He was happy to say that the account which Lord Chichester gave in his county was found to exist in other counties. By the returns which he held in his hand he found that the expenditure for the relief of the poor in England and Wales was, for the year ending Lady-day, 1848, £6,180,000, and for the year ending Lady-day, 1849, £5,792,000; and for the half-year, from Lady-day to Michaelmas of each year, he found a still greater proportional decrease in the expenditure, as compared with the corresponding period of 1848, for in the half-year ending Michaelmas, 1848, the expenditure was £1,760,000; while for the last half-year it was only £1,653,000. Again, on the 1st of July, 1848, there were 309,650 persons receiving parochial relief, while at the same period of the year 1849 there were only 827,150. On the 1st of January, 1849, there were relieved 987,164 persons; while on the 1st of January, 1850, there were only 753,000. With respect to the repeal of the Irish Poor-law, a more satisfactory with respect to able-bodied paupers; for in January, 1849, there were 201,644 able-bodied paupers, while on the 1st of January, 1850, there were only 179,000. In the county of Cumberland, the agricultural, as well as in the manufacturing counties. Throughout England there was a diminution of able-bodied paupers of 16 5-10 per cent on the 1st of January, 1850; and throughout Wales a decrease of 15 per cent. Looking at these facts, he would ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether the repeal of the Corn-laws had not operated beneficially for the agricultural labourers, and for all classes connected with the agricultural interest? And he had to say, in no measure doubtful manner, that they should be shortly re-consider their recent legislation with respect to the admission of foreign produce. (Cheers.) In the week ending on the 29th of December, 1849, the number of persons in receipt of paupers was 192,009; and on the 29th of December, 1849, the number was 194,323, while the out-door patients in the same period in 1848, was 333,421, and in 1849, 305,458; showing an immense diminution. He was willing to admit that these results were to some extent to be attributed to the increased activity and energy of the farmers, who were improving their farms, and in doing so, giving employment to a great additional number of agricultural labourers. He had great confidence in the energy and industry of the British farmers; and now that they had been thoroughly roused, he had no doubt that they would be soon able to recover their present depressed condition. On the year ending January 5, 1849, the exportation of British agricultural produce was 3,978,000lbs., while last year it was 11,000,000 lbs, and this increase had taken place when there was a decrease in the importation of foreign butter and cheese. He believed that next year the farmers would be in a better position than they were last year, and he hoped their condition would continue to improve. Our consumption had been increased very greatly in brandy, rum, ginger, and tea; the consumption of sugar had increased in pork, although the importations of foreign pork had fallen off. With respect to the importation of sugar, he was able to say that there had been a great increase in the importation of foreign sugar, in direct opposition of those who were opposed to the reduction of the duty on that important article. From the West Indies the importation had increased from 2,771,000 cwt. to 3,070,000 cwt.; from Mauritius, from 1,000,000 cwt. to 1,297,000 cwt.; and from the East Indies, from 1,382,000 cwt. to 1,356,000 cwt. On spirits entered for home consumption in England and Scotland there had been an increase from 5,000,000 gallons to 5,500,000 gallons, with a corresponding increase in every article used for the purposes of building and for carrying on processes of manufacture. He had also to observe that both in the number of vessels and the amount of tonnage entered inwards and outwards, there had been a large increase last year over the previous year. (Cheers.) These facts he thought justified him in saying that the country was in a state of improved prosperity. He was also glad to say that there had been an improvement in every branch of the public revenue, and from that increase and from reduced expenditure, there was on the 5th of January an excess of income over expenditure of £2,098,000. (Cheers.) Allusion had been made to the amount of gold in the bank, and he was proved that their transactions and been more than paid for by the increased exports of the country. He sincerely hoped that no rash legislation would be adopted to interfere with their present progressive course of prosperity, and that those persons in the agricultural districts who were suffering, would be able by increased energy to surmount all their difficulty. (Cheers.)

After some observations from Mr. H. Herbert and Sir J. Walsh in support of the amendment, and of Mr. Fagan against it,

Mr. Grantley Berkeley contended that if they wished to put the farmer on a footing of Free-Trade fairly, they must take off the land-tax, and the burdens that pressed on land; and he would put no Free-Trade wolf rum him.

On the motion of the Marquis of Granby, the debate was adjourned at five minutes past twelve til Friday.

Lord John Russell said to know from the hon. gentleman the member for Buckinghamsaire if they might expect a division on the next day (Friday).

Mr. Disraeli said he expected the division would take place on Friday, but, of course, he could give no pledge.

The House then adjourned, at a quarter past twelve o'clock.

Meeting of Protectionist Members of the House of Commons at Lord Stanley's.—A very numerous meeting of members of the House of Commons favourable to Protective duties, took place on Thursday at 1 o'clock, at Lord Stanley's residence, in St. James's-square. There were present, the Marquis of Granby, Marquis of Worcester, Marquis of Granby, Lord C. Manners, Lord G. Manners, Lord E. Hill, Lord E. Brooke, Lord A. Lennox, Lord G. Lennox, Lord H. Bentinck, Lord Burghley, Earl of March. The Earl St. Vincent was, we believe, the only Peer present at the meeting.

Resignation of Sir G. H. Smyth, Bart., M.P.—Colchester has suddenly been plunged into all the bustle and excitement of an approaching Parliamentary election, Sir G. H. Smyth, Bart., M.P., who, since the last session, has shown increased symptoms of the effects of age and declining health, having intimated his intention of immediately retiring from his post of representative, by an acceptance of the Chiltern Hundreds. Lord John Manners has been requested by a large body of the electors to serve in his stead

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday.

The Speaker took the chair at a quarter to four o'clock.

The early part of the sitting was occupied with the discussion of petitions on the subject of private bill.

Sir R. Inglis presented a petition from the island of Barbadoes, complaining of the manner in which the slave-trade was still carried on, and that the mode in which the products of slave labour were introduced into England was most injurious to the interests of free labour.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

Petitions were presented by Mr. Christopher from the county of Lincoln, and by other hon. members from various parts of the country, complaining of agricultural distress, and praying for legislative relief

Write was ordered for issue for the election of new members for the boroughs of Windsor and Colchester.

Mr. Adderley presented several petitions from South Africa, complaining of the recent Order in Council, by which the Cape colony was converted into a penal settlement.

Mr. Hutt gave notice of a motion for Thursday week, respecting the Slave-trade.

Mr Hume gave notice of a motion respecting the recent proceedings at Malta, in refusing admission to certain Italian refugees.

Mr. H. Berkeley said, at an early day he should bring before the House the important question of the Ballot.

In reply to Mr. Adderley, Mr. Hawes said the Neptune transport ship had been ordered from the Cape of Good Hope to Van Diemen's Land, and there was no foundation for the report that Sir W. J. Smith had been recalled. (Hear, hear.)

The Sessional Orders were then read over and agreed to, with the exception of that which authorized the reading of all orders of the day on "notice days," without any amendment being moved. This led to some discussion, in which Mr. Hume, Mr. Dennison, Mr. Henley, Lord John Russell, Mr. Herries, Sir R. Inglis, and other hon. members took part. A motion for the adjournment of the consideration of this order was, upon a division, negatived by a majority of 81 to 151. The remaining orders were then agreed to.

THE ADDRESS.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Marquis of Granby resumed the discussion on the Address, shortly before five o'clock. He observed that, from the manner in which that part of the Speech from the Throne was worded, which referred to the distress among the landed interest, it was evidently intended to insult the agricultural classes. He was satisfied that the distress which existed among the owners and occupiers of land would receive the sympathy of that House and the public, the consideration of which he was prepared to be involved in that distress. He reminded the House of the numbers, the industry, and the loyalty of the tenant farmers and agriculturists of this country. He did not think that their claims to relief under the laws and a fixed protection should be disregarded by the Government. If they were suffering distress at the present time when they had abundant crops, what must be their condition in times of scarcity? As the various petitions which had been held recently throughout the country the grievances that affected the agricultural body were fully stated. It was shown that the agricultural labourer was worse off under the Free-Trade system than under the Protective system. The wages of the working classes generally were reduced in a much larger proportion than the reduction in the price of food. The farmers generally had declared that they were unable any longer to maintain their labourers, and a great increase in pauperism must be the inevitable result. The noble Lord referred to the letters that had appeared in the Morning Chronicle, for the purpose of showing the large amount of distress that existed among the working classes engaged in all departments of labour. He also read letters from some of the manufacturing districts, showing that no such great prosperity existed among the manufacturing classes; and it was evident that any trifling increase of prosperity they had recently experienced was only temporary. By returns of the amount of cotton consumed at Lome, it was evident that the home trade was by far the most important of all, and that the farmers were the best customers the manufacturers had. He complained that nearly all articles of home manufacture were protected except those engaged in agriculture. It should be borne in mind that ten millions in value, or nearly one-third of the whole of the exports of England, were sent to America; and if they carried out their threat of raising the duties, and if, as they undoubtedly had the power, they refused to supply us with cotton, in what position would the manufacturers of this country be? The noble Lord concluded by calling upon the House to give some relief to the great and important interest with which he was connected.

Mr. E. Denison admitted the existence of great distress among the agriculturists, but thought they had gone the right way to remedy it. The farmers had been called to attend large public meetings, instead of endeavouring to improve the cultivation of their land so as to meet the present depression. The noble Lord appeared to think that a fixed duty was the only protection would enable them to compete with foreign corn. He believed, however, there was no probability of a return to that system. (Hear, hear.) His experience as a landowner satisfied him that the present depression was not to be found in the interests of the agricultural classes; although the recent legislative changes might have the effect of reducing the value of land, he believed that the benefit to the public generally far outweighed any private inconvenience or loss. He never gave a vote with greater sincerity of personal satisfaction, than he would give it against the amendment that had been proposed. (Cheers.)

Lord Norreys said he had not supported the motion of the hon. member for Buckinghamshire, because he had seen it was understood that, in the event of its being carried, no parties were prepared to take office in the place of the present Government. He thought the hopes that were held out to the farmers of a return to protective duties were the most fallacious that could be entertained. The continued agitation of this question was most detrimental to that repose and tranquility that were so much required, and that the amendment was, therefore, unnecessary, he should vote against it.

Capt. Pelham said, although he agreed in some of the statements made by hon. members on the Opposition benches, he could not bring himself to vote for the amendment. It was impossible to say that the system of Protection, which had been abandoned by the general consent of the country, should be again restored. At the same time he thought, that, to enable the farmer to meet the competition to which they were exposed, there ought to be a reduction of the burdens peculiarly affecting land; and that could only properly be effected by a revision and reduction of the general taxation of the country. His objection to the Corn-laws had always been that they were unjust to the other interests of the country. (Hear, hear.) He admitted that there might be cases in which he should be induced to go still further, and to sacrifice his private opinions for the purpose of keeping out of office men who would use their power to return to an antiquated system, which he believed had been most injurious to the real interests of the agricultural classes.

Mr. Christopher referred to the important meeting that had recently been held in that county of Lincoln, in which the tenant farmers had unanimously declared their inability to cultivate land at a profit with present prices. He regretted to say that pauperism had recently increased to a very alarming extent, and as it was evident that most of the poorer soils must be thrown out of cultivation, the amount of pauperism would be in a few months considerably increased. The hon. gentleman then referred to the contrasts and contradictions of the farm, by details to be stated to the House, to show that at present prices it was impossible to compete with the foreigner or to pay rent and taxes. Hopes had been held out to the agriculturists of more favourable times; but he was afraid that it would be long as the present enormous importation of foreign corn took place. (Hear, hear.) If, however, some change did not take place, he feared they would have, in many of the highly cultivated districts, a state of misery and amount of destitution as in the unfortunate district of Kilrush in Ireland. He suggested the great advantage that would arise from permitting the farmers of England to grow tobacco, and concluded by entreating the gentlemen opposite to vote for the amendment, as he thought the interests of his constituents had been most improperly slighted and slurred over in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Tomline McGregor observed that the unhappy condition in which Ireland had been for so many years placed under a system of Protection. The land was half uncultivated, the Irish labourers only half employed and half fed, and the country altogether in a state of the greatest destitution and misery. Under such circumstances he could not consent to vote for the amendment, the object of which was to promote a return to the system he had so much deprecated.

Mr. Fagan thought the amendment, on the contrary, one of very great importance, and contended that it was the duty of the legislature to give a more full expression to their sense of the existing agricultural distress than had been indicated in the Speech from the Throne. He unhesitatingly declared that distress to be the necessary consequences of the legislation of 1846 for the removal of Protection. Cheap bread, no doubt, on general principles, was of importance to every class of the community; but it did not follow that the agricultural labourer, who depended upon the amount of employment he might receive, was in a better condition merely because the price of bread was reduced to the lowest amount.

Mr. Muntz was ready at once to admit, while he deeply regretted, the existing agricultural distress. But Free-Trade was a settled question, and it would be quite impossible that the Government or the country could retrace its steps. He saw no reason for supposing that prices would rise. On the contrary, it was his belief that they would fall still lower. It was that which had induced him to vote for the repeal of the Corn-laws, as he was firmly convinced that nothing was more calculated to promote the interests of the industrious classes than a low price of the necessaries of life. For the same reason, he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. Herbert said the landed interest would never cease agitating the country until full justice was done them by the Legislature. Much reliance had been placed upon the assumed activity in the shipping trade; but it appeared that, although there were a large number of ships built or building, very few had been sold or brought into active service. The real fact was, that the trade in shipbuilding was less favourable in 1849 than it was in 1848. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had relied very much upon another point, viz. that the exports of 1849 had considerably exceeded those of 1848; but it should be borne in mind that the latter was a miserably bad year, and that the large amount of exports were clearly indicative of a want of demand at home. The assertion, therefore, of the Government, that the country had prospered under a Free-Trade policy, was entirely untenable. He trusted that the agriculturists of this country would not be induced to imitate the conduct of the Free-Traders, who had usurped the functions of the Government, and had dictated what legislative policy should be adopted. Let them rely upon the returning Justice and wisdom of Parliament, and their ultimate success was certain.

Mr. LABOUCHERE admitted that it was too early for the Government to boast of the effect of the recent legislative policy it had adopted. He could, however, confidently assert that it had not had the effect of paralysing the labours of the dockyards, or that it had produced any injurious effect upon the shipping interest of the country. In proof of that, he referred to the letters published by Mr. Lindsay in one of the daily papers, in which, although he was strenuously opposed to the repeal of the Navigation Laws, he urged upon the shipowning interest the necessity of using the most strenuous efforts to overcome with the foreigner, and not to allow themselves to be dismayed by the change which had taken place, and which must now be regarded as irrevocable. He was ready to admit the existence of very great agricultural distress—he deplored that distress, but he was conscientiously convinced that he could not do a greater injury to that interest than to hold out any hope to them that Protection, in any shape, would be restored. He trusted that distress would be but temporary, and he hoped that the system which promoted the comforts of the people and the interests of commerce and manufactures would ultimately be found beneficial to all. It was the interest, as he understood it, of the landlord, of the landless, and the tenantry to meet that depression, which was the inevitable result of the state of transition through which they are passing; and, before long, he trusted the agricultural interest would participate in the general prosperity of the country.

Mr. DISRAELI said it was admitted on all hands that distress prevailed in the agricultural districts of England; and, as regarded Ireland, he might call it agricultural desolation. (Hear, hear.) The very gentleman who had moved the Address had admitted that one of the most important interests in the kingdom had sustained a loss by the recent change in their legislation amounting to not less than one-eighth of the amount of the National Debt. He objected to the mode in which the existing distress was noticed in the Speech from the Throne: they were termed complaints; but there was a studious avoidance of any acknowledgment of the truth of the assertion that distress actually existed. The phraseology employed was a species of philanthropic mockery. If the terms of the amendment were referred to, it would be found that they were merely a recognition of the admissions made by Mr. Villiers in the previous evening. The cause he was advocating was that of British labour, or it was nothing; if it were not, all the patronage of all the peers and all the commons would not maintain it. Although some criticisms had been passed upon the intemperate language used at some of the county meetings recently held, he did not think any of them had gone the lengths of the violent harangues of the Free-Trade orators of Leeds or of Manchester, where it was asserted that the constitution of England only existed upon sufferance. (Hear, hear.) The only data upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had based the success of his Free-Trade experiments, were a diminution in the pauperism of the country to the amount of 7 per cent in the course of the last year. The Government appeared to forget that the agricultural labourers had been employed during 1849 to the extent of twenty per cent beyond the legitimate requirements of agriculture, but that factitious employment could not long be continued. The land of England had been always considered as raw material, and yet that raw material was taxed to support the interests of the lunatics, the animals, and all other requirements of the state. He could not understand why the two great departments of national industry, agriculture and manufactures, should continue to be in opposition and antagonism to each other. What the landed interest wanted was to be put upon an equal footing with the rest of their fellow-subjects, and in the second place to be placed on their own markets on an equality with the foreigner. It had been clearly shown that this was not a question merely of owners and occupiers of the soil; but, even if it were, they were a very numerous and influential class, which no Government could lightly pass over or neglect. The recent legislative changes had materially affected the prosperity of these classes; and all that was now asked was that their case should be taken into the earnest consideration of the Government. (Hear, hear.) He called upon the House, in the name of their suffering interests, to do justice to them. They could not carry out their Free-Trade principles to their ultimate consequences. They might pride themselves at present upon their accidental majority, obtained by the union of the incongruous and hostile parties, unanimous only in their animosity to the landed interest; but they might rely upon it that a perseverance in that policy would ultimately lead to the destruction of the Constitution, and the annihilation of the greatness of the country. (Cheers.)

LORD JOHN RUSSELL complained of the ambiguous character of the amendment, and also of the diversity of opinion that appeared to prevail among the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. While some of them called for a re-consideration of the law, another party took a different course, and demanded that justice should be done to the landed interest at once. He did not think that there was any real ground of complaint with regard to the wording of the Address, although he admitted that the phrase which had occasioned so much discussion; and he did not think that the wording of the amendment made any real or substantial difference in the case. If the Government had thought that no distress only existed among the agricultural classes, they would have advised her Majesty instead of saying that the present distress arose from the recent legislation of that House, have congratulated the House and the country on that legislation which had created so great an amount of plenty and cheapness of provisions, and which had enabled the poor to procure a more ample supply of the comforts, at the same time, of the labouring class. They had been able to obtain for many years. If they looked to the present condition of the country, they would find that by the Poor-law returns there had been a diminution of 7 per cent in the number receiving relief in the past year—there had been an enormous increase in the shipping trade, which had been an increase of ten millions in the exports of the country—the various other sources of national wealth showed that the entire country was in the full enjoyment of the profits of that legislation, by which was the great index of the amount of comforts enjoyed by the people, showed a considerable increase, and exhibited a striking improvement in the condition of the people. From all the manufacturing districts the reports were, that the people were in full employment and at a fair average rate of wages. If, after the House had deliberately sanctioned the present system, they were now to raise the question of a return to Protection, they would be likely to endanger other questions of vital importance to the best interests of the country. They would have the Church question again brought forward; and that, and many similar ones, would be raised in great peril. He thought, under all the circumstances, it would be better for them not to run the risk of any such danger; and he called upon the House to give a decided negative to the amendment that had been submitted for its consideration. (Cheers.)

Mr. COBDEN had come to the House convinced that an opportunity would have been afforded for discussing the relative merits of the principles of Free-Trade and Protection, after what had occurred in the various meetings throughout the country. For so persevering had been the statements of the Protectionists on the subject, that there was a large body of persons who believed that the question was not yet finally settled; while another portion of the community was under the impression that some great injustice had been done to the agricultural interest by our recent commercial legislation. He was, therefore, not a little surprised to find the hon. member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) passing by the question as he had done. Many of the hon. gentleman's friends had indeed taken a different course, and, in a straightforward manner, had declared that Protection was necessary; but the hon. gentleman who was the leader had not had repudiated the question altogether. He had talked about the raw material of land, and wrapt round his ideas, whatever they really were, with impenetrable frequency; but he altogether declined from coming to a clear discussion of the comparative merits of the two systems. How, then, were they to deal with the party whose leader marched off one way while his followers pursued another. For his own part, looking to the course pursued by the landed proprietary during the winter, who went about the country to depict the value of the raw material of their land, he could not help thinking they were very blind as to what were their true interests. Their arguments would be retorted in a future time upon their own heads by those very farmers whom they were now seeking to lead into a course which was alike fallacious and dangerous. At all events, as the honourable member for Buckinghamshire had declared at those country meetings, that the House of Commons was the proper place for the discussion of those great rival principles of commercial legislation, let him not now shrink from that discussion. He called upon him at once to give notice of a motion for the discussion of the question. He would do so, if he valued the hon reputation.

After a few words from Mr. DRUMMOND and Colonel THOMPSON, the House divided—

APPALLING CATASTROPHE.—The Limerick papers received on Thursday bring the particulars of a melancholy catastrophe in one of the workhouses of that city. Between eight and nine o'clock on Tuesday night, shortly after the inmates (500 women) had retired to rest on the lofts of the store—it being one of the auxiliary receptacles—a false alarm of fire was raised. A fearful scene of confusion ensued, the women rushing to the ladder leading from that portion of the building to the ground-floor. The terrified creatures, in their efforts all to gain access to the ladder, upon which several had crowded together, necessarily caused a crush and confusion, until ultimately the paupers on the other lofts congregated in the narrow passage, when the whole of the inmates, and numbers were precipitated to the ground from a height of not more than ten feet. The scene that ensued is almost indescribable—the shrieks from be ow rendered those above to press more eagerly towards the staircase—and, as they came to the verge of the passage, down they fell in crowds over each other! For some time all remonstrance was unavailing to dissuade the paupers from rushing headlong to ruin; and before the exertions of the matron (Mrs. Sheridan) and assistant-master (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had effect, twenty-seven women were killed, or rather suffocated, from falling on the top of each other! In addition to this frightful loss of life, twenty-nine more were so dangerously bruised, that the worst results are apprehended.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

The absurdity of allowing military men to have control in matters affecting the liberty of the subject, has never been more clearly exemplified than within the last few days at Lyons. M. Victor Hugo, in his place in the French Chamber, some ten days ago, made what would be considered here a very radical speech against the Government Bill on Public Instruction; it was nothing more. It has been published at Lyons in the ordinary course of journalism: and, as we learn by yesterday's dates from Paris, the general commanding in that district has, by virtue of the state of siege existing there, forthwith seized those papers which dared to exhibit such a spirit of free discussion, as to notice the obnoxious effusion. This is the liberty of a Republic! Thus the fruit of Revolutions!!

M. Mouillard, responsible editor of the Democratic Socialist journal La Liberté has been cited before the assize Court of the Seine for a seditious article, entitled "Anarchy," and sentenced to three months' imprisonment and 4000f fine. M Mouillard had been previously tried and sentenced by the Court by default; but, as is usual in such cases, without the intervention of the Jury.

GREECE

Advices from Greece of the 19th ult. bring intelligence of a probable rupture between that Power and Great Britain. Mr. Wyse, the English representative at the Court of Athens, it appears, had made certain and unexpected demands upon the Government of Greece, which that Ministry felt no disposition to accede to, and expressed its willingness to refer the question to the mediation of France and Russia. Mr. Wyse, however, demanded a positive answer "yes" or "no," in twenty-four hours; at the expiration of which time, the reply not being satisfactory, he threatened to ask for his passports—which menace, nevertheless, was not put into execution; for we find, by a postscript to a letter of the 18th ult, that he had agreed to accept the mediation of the two Powers before proposed.

RUSSIA.

The alleged Russian victory in the Caucasus, noticed in another column, turns out to be a sham. Authentic intelligence received yesterday, and the Dardanelles, dated Tiflis, the 2nd inst., has great victory turned to defeat. St. Petersburgh Gazette has been gained by the Russians over Schamyl, it was, on the contrary, the Russians who were obliged to retire after a heavy loss.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

LONDON ORPHAN ASYLUM, CLAPTON.—A general court of this charity was held on Monday, at the London Tavern, for the purpose of transacting the annual business, and electing 30 additional children. There were 143 candidates. Mr. Alderman Thompson, M.P., in the chair. The report stated that, since the last general meeting, 58 children had completed their term, and left the institution. At the present time (including the 30 to be elected that day) there were 410 enjoying the benefits of the institution, making the total number, since the commencement, 1835. As a proof of the extremely healthy condition of the children of this charity, it appeared that not one case of cholera had occurred during the year, and only three deaths had taken place for that period. Owing to the limited state of their funds, out of the 143 candidates only 30 could be elected, as they were unable, at present, to enlarge the number of admissions. A special attention has been paid to the education of the children. A regular half-yearly examination took place to test the progress of each, and the examiners begged to testify to the continued and increasing advancement which had taken place; and they considered the best proof of this fact was the excellent character the children had universally maintained after they had left this school. The most rigid economy consistent with the efficient carrying on of this institution had been observed, for the annual expenditure was nearly £8000, whereas their certain income was only £1600, leaving a very large sum to be supplied by subscriptions and donations. The accounts showed the receipts of the past year, from subscriptions, donations, and various other sources, had been £5000 11s., and the expenditure for the same period had been £5737 7s.; leaving a balance of £1619 19s. The report concluded by appealing for the sympathy and assistance of the public present, by aid the funds of this most deserving and useful institution. The report was adopted. The Duke of Cleveland was elected president, the Dowager Countess of Westmoreland a lady president, and Mr. James Keating and Mr. Henry Glover vice-presidents. The election was then proceeded with. The thirty children elected will be admitted on the 21st instant.

ROYAL FREE HOSPITAL.—The annual general court of the governors of this institution was held at the board-room of the Hospital in Gray's-inn-lane, on Tuesday evening. Mr. W. Pritchard, the High Bailiff of Southwark, took the chair, at eight o'clock. The annual report stated, that, in the beginning of the year 1849, 154 pauper children from Hackney, of both sexes, were in the house, were admitted, all of them being more or less, but 80 of them decidedly, afflicted with cholera. Four only of them, who were past hope when they were admitted, died. The most unfortunate part of the whole circumstance was, that the cholera broke out generally in the metropolis, the hospital, as it did in the year 1832, threw open its doors to all persons afflicted with that malady. Upwards of 2000 persons attacked with cholera were relieved during the year, exclusive of those admitted in 1848, was 184. The total number of persons relieved since the foundation of the hospital amounted to 310,393. The receipts for the past year amounted to £2550, leaving an excess over the expenditure of £565. Under the committee to pay off old debts to the amount of nearly £3000, and to re-open another large ward, called the Gurney ward, containing fifty beds, which had been unavoidably closed for a time, through pressure of debt and want of funds. The total amount of payments was £3521. Thanks were addressed to the parties before referred to has been the means of restoring the classification of patients. The report was unanimously adopted. The balance-sheet showed that in the year 1849 the donations amounted to £2338 7s. 10d.; annual subscriptions to £1580 0s. 6d.; legacies, £594 9s.; rent of house in Greville-street, £55; which, with a balance in the hands of the treasurer and secretary of £160 4s. 6d.; amounted to £5719 17s. 10d. Thirty of the governors were then proposed and appointed by ballot to form the committee of management for the year 1850. Dr. Marsden, as founder of the institution, was appointed an additional member of the committee and weekly board; and Mr. John Masterman, M.P., was elected treasurer; and Messrs. Chellin, C. F. J. Hooper, and George Locke were appointed auditors.

CITY OF LONDON GENERAL PENSION SOCIETY.—A special general meeting of the life subscribers to this institution was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern, for the purpose of taking into consideration the present condition of the funded property belonging to the society. Wm. Lovell, Esq., took the chair at one o'clock. The secretary, Mr. George Spence, opened the proceedings by stating that the object of the meeting was to consolidate the permanent fund belonging to the society, and transfer the whole of the stock into one account, to be placed in the hands of four trustees, and not in those of subscribers. It appeared from the secretary's statement, that the society possessed stock to the amount of £7359 13s. 6d., which consisted of a permanent fund of £3703 17s., an available fund of £979 6s., and a special fund arising from a bequest of the late W. D. Broadbent, Esq., amounting to £3-3 10s. 6d. The permanent fund was invested in several separate funds, and in various different names; in one trust, three out of four of the trustees were dead. In the other trusts, one or two or more were either dead or unable to act. In addition to the above-mentioned objects, it was also necessary to direct a positive transfer to be made from those separate trusts. Resolutions having effect were then proposed and unanimously carried, viz., that with a view to consolidate the permanent fund belonging to the society, the whole of the stock invested in that interest be transferred into one account, and that such account be stock in the Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent Annuities; that Henry Burn, Esq., and Mr. Cadbell, Mr. Luke J. Hansard, and Mr. George Hayward (who was appointed to act in the place of his deceased father, Mr. John Pearson Hayward), being severally life subscribers to the institution, be appointed trustees of the said permanent fund, and that the various sums forming that fund, and now in the hands of several separate trustees, be transferred to their account.

METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY.—On Tuesday evening, a crowded public meeting of the ratepayers of Marylebone took place at the Princess's Concert Rooms, Castle-street, Oxford-street, for the purpose of considering the supply of water, and the proposition of the Grand Junction Water Company. Alderman Sir Peter Laurie presided; and on the platform were observed Mr. Chidley Plowden, M.P., Mr. Wyld, M.P., Mr. Walpole Eyre, Major Moore, Mr. Chapman, Mr. W. Williams (late M.P. for Coventry), Mr. John Blake Kirby, Mr. Peter Laurie, and other county magistrates. Nearly the whole of the members of the Marylebone vestry, and about 1500 people, were present.—Mr. S. C. Homersham, the engineer of the Watford project, explained the nature of the plan.—Mr. Nicholay then detailed at great length the evils to which the inhabitants of Marylebone were subjected, and moved a resolution to the effect "That the present supply of water to the parish was impure in quality, deficient in quantity, inconvenient in its distribution, and exorbitant in its cost."—Mr. Kensett seconded the motion.—Carried nem. con.—Mr. Plowden, M.P., moved the 2nd resolution: "That, having heard an accredited statement of the object and proposition of the London (Watford) Spring-Water Company, this meeting is of opinion that the establishment of such company is calculated to remedy the existing evil, and entitled to public confidence and support."—Mr. Chapman, a county magistrate, seconded the motion on which Mr. Wyld, M.P., called upon the meeting to cease to be Marylebone, any scheme of water supply, unless that scheme gave the power of local and parochial control over the expenditure and management of the distribution of the water.—(Loud cheers.)—Mr. Kensett concurred in the proposition. A local member for Bodmin as chimerical, and said he wanted to see a sort of universal suffrage with regard to water, by the ratepayers taking the shares themselves (Oh, oh!" and great surprise). Mr. Ambrose Moore, one of the directors of the company, rose to reply to the observation of Mr Wyld. He candidly admitted that the company did not intend to admit the principle of parochial representation at their board; and in answer to a question put by a ratepayer as to the price to be charged for the water, he referred to the bill, which showed that, whilst a house rated at £20 per year was to pay 20s. per year, or 5 per cent, the house rated above £100 per year was only to pay 2½ per cent.—This declaration was the signal for the most desperate uproar and groaning on the part of the meeting.—Mr. W. Williams denounced the bill, which would tax the poor man 5 per cent., while it let the rich man off for 2½ per cent. upon his water. (Loud cheers.) -Mr. Moore again attempted to address the meeting but they would not hear a single word. Mr. Paton, the projector of the company, then came forward, and said he had been all his life struggling to get the people of London pure water and cheap water. (Oh, oh.) He was convinced that by his plan Marylebone alone could be supplied at £1 per house, or say £40,000 per year. He did not draw this bill, and he utterly and entirely repudiated it, and called on the meeting to do the same. After great confusion, the chairman himself moved a resolution, "That ten gentleman be appointed as a committee by the meeting to meet the directors of the company, and insist upon a proper adjustment of the scale of charges in the bill, and that they adjourn to receive a report of that committee." (Cheers.) This was ultimately assented to, and the following gentlemen were appointed as such committee, viz. Mr. W. Williams, Mr. Wyld, M.P., Mr. Plowden, M.P., Mr. Nicholay, Mr. Kensett, Mr. Chapman, Mr. Soden, Mr. Glasier, Mr. Joseph, and Mr. Peter Laurie. The meeting then separated.

DEATHS AND DEATHS.—Births registered in the week ending Saturday, Jan. [illegible] 705; females, 728: total, 1494. Deaths during the same period [illegible] Males, 508; females, 526: total, 1034. The deaths thus registered exhibit a decrease of 122 on those of the previous week. A comparison of the same weeks of former years shows that the mortality has not been so low as at the present time since 1846; in the early part of the years 1847-9 the deaths ranged weekly from 1200 to 1450. The average of corresponding weeks in ten previous years (1840-9) is 1084, or, if a correction is made for increase of population, 1183, compared with which the present return shows a decrease of 49 deaths. The deaths from consumption were 128, or rather less than the average. Amongst other fatal diseases, bronchitis is more predominant, and has carried off 121 persons, a number which, though less than in the week before, exceeded by 31 the corrected average of ten corresponding weeks of former years. It is worthy of remark that this complaint, which has exceeded the average during the last six years, has, since 1844, produced at this season a weekly mortality more than fourfold its former amount. Pneumonia was fatal to only 78 persons last week (a great majority of whom were children), whilst the corrected average of ten corresponding weeks is 103; this decrease, though it has fluctuated in its weekly numbers from 64 to 156, has not shown the same disposition as bronchitis to increase during later years. The deaths of 7 nonagenarians were registered last week; of these, a woman at the age of 96 years, and a man 99. The deaths of 105 persons were registered in workhouses, 57 in hospitals, and 13 in the two Royal hospitals, amongst whom were 7 pensioners at Greenwich. Two died between the 18th and 24th of January, at ages ranging from 87 to 84. The mortality from epidemics continues to be comparatively low, though measles and diarrhœa (from the former there having been 98 deaths, and from the latter 14) are about the average. 11 children died of croup.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—The mean daily reading of the barometer at Greenwich Observatory was above 30 inches on the first five days of the week; the mean of the week was 30.056. The daily mean temperature rose from 29 deg. on Sunday to 43 deg. on Friday; the mean of the week was 35.5 deg., which is rather less than the average of the same week in seven years. The mean temperature was 9 deg. below the average of the same day on Monday; on Friday it was 8 deg. above it.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN.—Jan. 31: Meeting of Birmingham Shareholders: the Mayor of Birmingham in the chair.—Resolutions were adopted declaratory of the opinion of the meeting that more extensive powers should be kept to shareholders with regard to the audit of railway accounts, secured from the control of the directors, and free from Government interference.

CALEDONIAN.—The London committee of shareholders issued a circular to the proprietors of this company on Thursday, in which they recommend that a proposed compromise with the directors shall be accepted, by which the latter agree to resign their seats at the meeting of the 6th instant, on condition of the proprietors adopting certain share purchases made by the directors, and applying to Parliament for indemnity to the directors; and to exercise the unexhausted borrowing powers of the company, to the extent of £65 600, to cover certain claims on the company, for which the present directors are personally responsible.

GREAT WESTERN.—The committee of consultation on the affairs of this company issued their report on Thursday. They recommend that on the present and next Ordinary Hines now in operation, no further expenditure beyond the payment of arrears, amounting to about £350,000, should be incurred without an express vote of the proprietors; that the Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth line, of the unexpended extent of 113 miles, shall only be completed for twenty-four miles at present: that of lines leased at a fixed rate of interest, the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, from the inability of the company to complete the line, being a mere nominal liability, be left as it is; that modified terms be entered into, with the Bristol Water Company for the use of the line to Swansea only; and that the Gloucester and Dean Forest line be completed, as lately to prove a profitable investment. The committee then take into consideration the proposed amalgamation of the Great Western with the Birmingham, and the Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Dudley—and recommend their completion, to enable the Great Western to make arrangements with other companies, especially those on the Midland and North-Western, to lessen the pressure on the Great Western. The works on that portion of the Oxford and Rugby line from Fenny Compton to Rugby, the committee recommend should be suspended; especially as the traffic on the Oxford line may soon be expected. They have satisfied themselves that there is no ground for the report existing that there are heavy claims against the company, and have recommended such advances as the salaries of the clerks and officers require, and which is considerable saving to the shareholders. An independent engineer has been appointed to survey the line. The committee conclude by recommending that parties shall be selected and elected by the proprietors, and by the shareholders; that an efficient audit shall be established; and that, in future, estimates of probable expenditure shall be submitted to the proprietors at their half-yearly meeting, and no votes taken upon them, in the same manner as the estimates are voted for the public departments in Parliament.

CHESTER AND HOLYHEAD.—THE BRITANNIA BRIDGE.—A novel and very interesting process in connexion with this structure has just been brought to a successful termination. The lifting of one of the wrought-iron land tubes on to the main span in the recess of the tower, by lowering it sensibly 14 inches on to its permanent resting-place, and whereby its weight, 880 tons, acting as a counterbalance over the tower, had the effect of raising up the centre of the main tube of 1500 tons weight upwards of two inches, and of course adding materially to its rigidity and strength. A precisely similar operation has now to be performed with the land or terminal tube on the other side; and by which the centres of each of the grand spans will be raised altogether four inches.

THE NAVAN BRANCH (IRELAND).—The Railway Commissioners having already certified this line as ready for public traffic, will, in a few days, give a final certificate, such as the act requires, to authorise its transference to the Dublin and Drogheda Company; and it is expected that in the course of next week the line will be opened to the public. We are happy to say that both boards are proceeding amicably to arrange for the opening as speedily as possible.

PROTECTIONIST MEETING AT LINCOLN.

ON Friday week, a meeting of the nobility, gentry, farmers, merchants, and others, of the county of Lincoln, convened by the High Sheriff, in compliance with a numerously signed requisition, was held at the Castle of Lincoln, "to take into consideration the present depressed state of the agricultural and other branches of native industry."

A substantial building had been erected in the Castle-yard, immediately in front of the Shire-hall, for the accommodation of the speakers and their friends; and as, in consequence of an expressed intention on the part of the Lincolnshire Free-Traders to meet their Protectionist opponents on this occasion and propose counter resolutions, a hostile collision between the two parties was apprehended, the High Sheriff took the prudent course of having a large number of special constables sworn in for the preservation of the peace. This precautionary measure probably prevented the recurrence of such disgraceful scenes as have recently been enacted at Stafford and other places.

When the Castle doors were opened, at twelve o'clock, there was a rush to the space in front of the hustings, which was speedily occupied by 6000 or 7000 persons, and shortly afterwards that number was considerably increased by the arrival of persons who had reached Lincoln by railway or otherwise after the commencement of the business. The greatest number of present at any period of the day was probably from 10,000 to 12,000, among whom there were many agricultural labourers. There was also a considerable number of tenant-people of the lower class, who contrived in a body to secure a position immediately in front of the hustings, and who ranged themselves under the bar of Mr. Norman and Free-Trade.

Among the gentlemen on the hustings were Lord Burghley, M.P.; Mr. R. A. Christopher, M.P.; Colonel Sibthorp, M.P.; Mr. C. Chaplin, Sir R. Sheffield, Bart., J. C. Sheffield, Esq., Mr. G. H. Tacker, Mr. G. H. Packe, Mr. C. Anderson, Sir John Nelthorpe, Mr. W. Parker, Mr. C. Anderson, Sir H. Dymoke, Mr. Charles Seeley, and Mr. C. Turner, Sir M. Cholmeley, and Mr. G. T. W. Sibthorpe.

The High Sheriff, having opened the proceedings, read a letter from Lord Brownlow, the Lord-Lieutenant of the county, in which he expressed his regret that the state of his health would not permit him to be present, but highly approving of the object of the meeting. A county meeting was the only legitimate mode of making known to the Crown the present grievances of agriculture; and he trusted that the meeting would be conducted in a temperate manner, as more likely to gain the object they had in view than acting in an unbecoming spirit. (Cheers.)

Mr. C. Chaplin, in moving the first resolution, said: Lincolnshire was entirely an agricultural county, possessing no large manufactures, and, therefore, industrious labouring population were entirely dependent upon agriculture for their subsistence. No one would deny, not even the most stanch Free Trade, that great distress existed, no only in the town of Lincoln, but all the villages throughout the county. As regarded the city of Lincoln, he could speak positively of the existence of that distress. Every man was applying to him, and asking where the next employment was. They said they could find no employment, and had no parish to go to—a state of things such as of the present law of settlement—and that their only alternative was to sell their furniture, break up their little establishments, and go into the union. In the Sleaford

Union there were at present 103 persons more than at the corresponding period of last year. (Hear.) This was a very hard case for these poor men, and every farmer would agree with him that it was an evil which was upon the increase. ("No, no.") Those who cried "No" did not employ labourers; but all who did would agree with him in saying that, as a class, they were hard-working men. (Cheers.) Then what was the cause of their present distress? It was simply this—that the tenant-farmers and those engaged in cultivating the land were not able to make money enough to employ the labourers. (Cries of "Lower your rents.") It has been said that landlords should lower their rents; but nobody was at liberty to ask that of him, unless he was one of his tenants. It was a matter with which the meeting had nothing to do. (Cheers and disapprobation.) The farmer was not able to employ so many labourers on his farm, and therefore these poor men suffered. Now, at this present moment the average price of wheat was 33s. A duty of 8s. a quarter would give that amount in addition to the farmers; taking three quarters of wheat an acre as the average cultivation, it would put 24s. an acre in the farmer's pocket. (Cheers.) This would enable him to give 1s. 6d. or 2s. a week more to the poor labourer. (Cheers, and "No, no.") An addition of 8s. a quarter to the price of wheat would be equal to 2d. a stone additional for flour; and as a labourer used about two stones of flour a week he would only have to pay 6d. a week more than at present, while he would have his wages increased 1s. 6d. or 2s. a week. (Cheers, and "No, no.") He would thus have more to pay for other things besides flour. (Hear, hear.) He had in his hand a placard in which the Lincolnshire landlords were called "bread-taxing land-lords." They might call him what they pleased; but he only wished to see the labourers as comfortable in their positions in life as he was himself. (Cheers and uproar.) He employed a great many labourers; but if the present system went on, it would be impossible for either the landlords or the tenants to do so. They were told to improve their cultivation. Within the last twenty years the population of the country had increased by 100,000 men, and how could that population have been supported if the cultivation of the soil had not increased? (Cheers.) If Government, however, allowed foreigners, who had little or no taxation and no poor-rates, to come here and undersell the farmers, a great part of the land would go out of cultivation; and then what would become of the labourers? (Cheers.) The foreigner would soon glut the markets of this country with his produce, but he would have his own price. (Hear.) Many of the landlords might have other resources, but what would become of those industrious men who had invested their money in land which, under the faith of being protected, they had been induced to incluse? What was to become of the money they had borrowed for that purpose? They could not get it back, for people would not buy the land; but those who lent it would insist upon having their interest. (Hear, hear.) It was well known to everybody that the town of Lincoln was in great distress; and it could not be otherwise with the tradesmen there, if the farmers were not able to spend their money there every market-day. (Cheers.) He must pause a moment to get a little wind. (Laughter, and a cry of "Try it with it.") He would try. The labourers of the county had only 6s. or 7s. a week, not because they were not able to do their work, but because the farmers were obliged to curtail their expenses. (A cry of "Lower your rents, and then we will be able to employ labourers.") That was not their business. (Hear.) That illustrious man Sir R. Peel.—(a laugh)—told them to grow more corn and to cultivate their farms highly; but he should like to know how they were to cultivate highly without money. (Cheers.) A clergyman in the north had also told them to purchase ammonia, which was only a fine name for guano; but it was the greatest folly in the world to tell the farmers in many places to resort to high farming, because it could not be done higher than at present. (Hear, hear.) Then there was a fellow who made razor-strops, who had told them they could grow turnips on a deal board if they chose. (Laughter.) Now, what could exceed the absurdity of such recommendations as these? (Cheers, and disapprobation.) They should, in considering this question, consider that the poor-rates were raised on the land only, and that they amounted to about £8,000,000. Then there were the highway rate, the county rates, and other taxes, amounting in all to £12,000,000, that did not fall on the commercial classes at all. (Hear.) By the act of Elizabeth, providing for the poor, it was enacted that all property should be rated for that purpose. This was not known till about eight years ago; and ever since, the sly millowners had contrived to get an act passed annually, relieving what was called stock in trade from the rate. (Cheers.) Now if a tax was laid upon calicoes and other goods, such stocks as that of Mr. Norton, of Lincoln, a great deal of money would be raised for the poor. (Cheers and uproar.) He hoped that when the bill again came before Parliament, the members for the county would strongly oppose it. (Cheers.) Mr. Chaplin concluded by moving the following resolution:—

That the free and unrestricted importation of foreign produce has brought upon the agricultural interest and all others employed in connexion with it in this country, great and almost unprecedented distress; and that a dutiful and loyal address be presented to her Majesty the Queen, and also petitions to both Houses of Parliament, praying that the Queen and Parliament will take the same into their immediate and serious consideration, and impose such fair and reasonable duties on foreign produce as may improve the revenue of the country and relieve the present distress.

Mr. G. F. Heneage seconded the resolution.

Mr. J. Norton, draper, Lincoln, proposed an amendment. Mr. Chaplin had expressed his sympathy for the poor, and he gave him credit for that feeling. He said all property ought to pay towards the relief of the poor; and he (Mr. Norton) fully agreed with him. He had a document in his hand containing a statement of the amount of the extra-parochial land in the county of Lincoln, and he found that Mr. Chaplin had 4000 acres, which did not pay one penny to the relief of the poor. (Cheers and uproar.) General Reeves had 500 acres; Mr Sawley, 500 acres; Mr. Neville, 1500 acres; Mr. R. Collett, 300 acres; and Major Calgrave, 1400 acres—amounting altogether to 10,000 acres in the county of Lincoln which did not pay a penny to the poor. (Cheers and disapprobation.) Yet these were the gentlemen who came there to express sympathy for the poor. (Cheers and hisses.) He regretted that the agriculturists of England were not in so good a position as he could wish; but he was there to prove that the commercial interests of the country never were in so prosperous a condition (Cheers.) He was satisfied that the welfare of the country could only be secured by carrying out the principles of free commerce, and he therefore called upon them to support his amendment:—

That this meeting regards with great satisfaction the improved state of the manufacturing and trading interests of this country under the Free-Trade policy, as evidenced by the large extension of our exports, the increase of the bullion in the Bank, the augmentation of the revenue, and the diminution of pauperism. That it recognises the many advantages that have arisen from the plenty and cheapness of the first necessaries of life, and that this plenty and cheapness is the only basis on which the welfare and happiness of the industrious orders of this country can be permanently established. That this meeting, therefore, does not desire to retrograde to the old prohibitive system; but that in order to meet the lowered prices of agricultural produce and to enable the British farmer to compete with the foreign grower, it is necessary that the rent of land let at a high scale of prices be reduced in conformity with the present price of agricultural produce ("Hear, hear," and sneers observing); that the farmers will find it requisite to increase the productive powers of the soil; that the tenant-right of property in all unexhausted improvements created by skill and capital be established by law, and that a greatly reduced amount of local and national taxation is necessary to promote the welfare of all the industrial classes of the kingdom.

The High Sheriff then took a show of hands upon the amendment, and about one-third of the persons assembled appeared to be in its favour. There was, however, an overwhelming majority against it, and the High Sheriff declared the amendment negatived. This decision was received with loud cheering by the Protectionist party. The High Sheriff then put the resolution, against which comparatively few hands were held up; and he announced that the resolution was carried, amid renewed and hearty cheering. The next resolution proposed was as follows:—

That, by the abrogation of the duties on corn and cotton the tenant-farmers of the United Kingdom have been most cruelly treated and wronged. It was on the faith of Protection being maintained that they invested their capital in the soil; and, unless Protection be speedily restored, thousands of them must inevitably be reduced to a state of pauperism.

To this Mr. C. Seeley moved, as an amendment—

That, as the tenant-farmers require immediate relief, their interest will be better promoted by landlords immediately reducing their rents, and by the Government immediately abolishing the malt duty, than by any address to the Queen, or by any petitions to Parliament for a renewal of protective duties.

The High Sheriff put the question on the amendment, which was negatived, and the original resolution was carried by a very large majority.

Sir R. Sheffield then proposed an address to be presented to the Queen, in conformity with the first resolution, and Colonel Sibthorp seconded the motion.

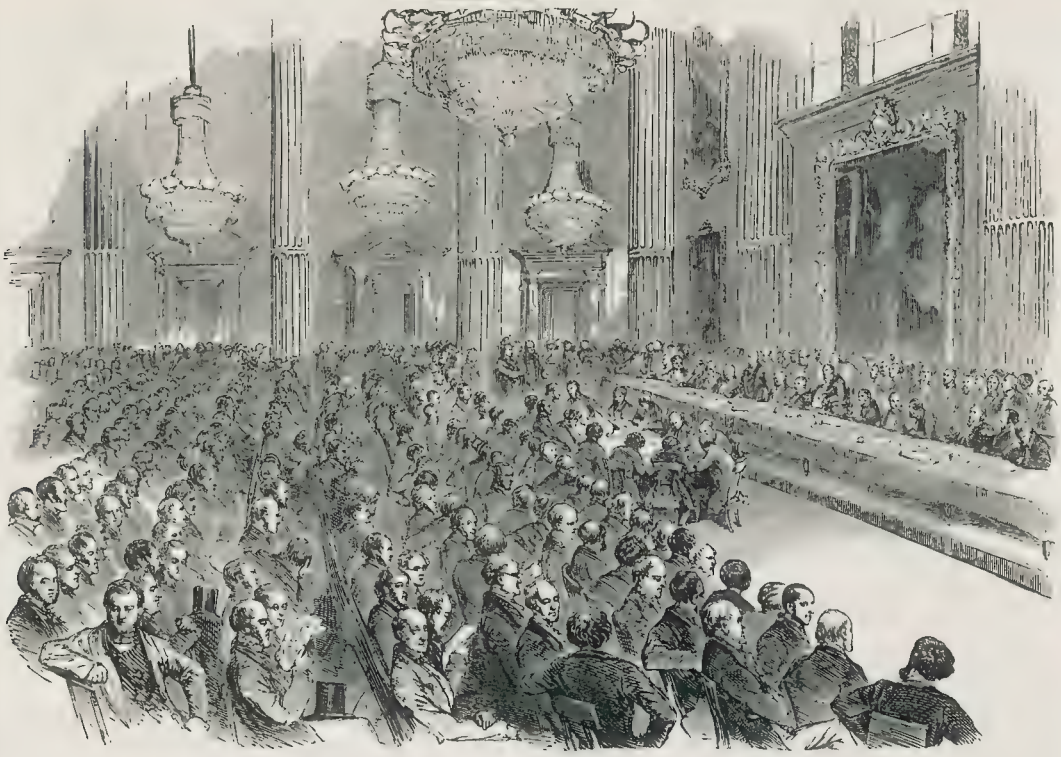
The address was carried by a large majority, and Mr. Christopher was requested to present a petition embracing the terms of the resolutions to the House of Commons. The meeting was then addressed by Mr. Christopher, M.P.; Mr. Colmeley, and Lord Burghley, M.P., and the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the Sheriff.

SCENE AT THE CASTLE GATE, LINCOLN.

THE GREAT PROTECTIONIST MEETING, IN THE CASTLE-YARD, LINCOLN.



THE GREAT EXHIBITION OF INDUSTRY, 1851.—MEETING AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION OF INDUSTRY, 1851.

On Friday week, a meeting of the merchants, bankers, and traders of the city of London was held at the Egyptian Hall, Mansion House, for the purpose of taking into consideration certain resolutions having in view the promotion of the grand Exhibition in 1851 of the Industry of all Nations.

Shortly after two o'clock, the Lord Mayor—followed by the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, Lord Granville, Sir E. N Buxton, Mr. W. Cotton, Mr. Humphery, M.P.; Mr. Raikes Currie, M.P.; Mr. T. Baring, M.P.; Sheriffs Lawrence and Nicoll, the Governor of the Bank, the Deputy-Governor, Lord R. Grosvenor, M.P.; Alderman Thompson, M.P.; Mr. Forster, M.P.; Alderman Hooper, Mr. W. Tite, Mr. W. C. M. Kent, Mr A. Caldecott, Mr. S. J. Loyd, Rev. T. Binney, Under-Sheriffs Millard and Wire, Alderman Finnis, Major Finnis, Mr. J. T. Travers, Baron Rothschild, M.P.; Rev. S. R. Cattley, Mr. J. Bates, Mr. W. Cubitt, M.P.; Mr. T. Cubitt, Mr. R. Harvey, Mr. J. H. Palmer, Mr. C. Francis Mr. T. Bazley, Chairman of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce; Mr. R. W. Kennard; Mr. C. Hill, late Sheriff; Rev. C. Marshall, Mr. H. Cole, Mr. W. C. Dilke, Mr. J. H. Pilcher, Mr. J. Masterman, jun.; Captain Ibbotson, and Sir James Duke - entered the hall, and was received with plaudits. Lord J. Russell arrived soon after the commencement of the proceedings, and was greeted with great applause

The Lord Mayor, having taken the chair, explained that he called the meeting at the request of the Royal Commissioners, in order that a subscription might be commenced to carry out the magnificent project of his Royal Highness Prince Albert for an exhibition of the works of industry of all nations. (Applause.)

The following resolutions were agreed to:—

That the proposal of his Royal Highness the Prince Albert to open an exhibition of the works of industry of all nations, in the year 1851, in this metropolis, is a measure in harmony with the public feeling, and entitled to the general support of the community, and is eminently calculated to improve manufactures, and to aid in diffusing the principles of universal peace.

That this meeting entirely concurs in the reasons which have induced the Royal Commission to terminate the contract with the Messrs. Munday, and to rest the success of the proposed exhibition entirely upon public liberality.

Lord John Russell, on coming forward to move the next resolution, was received with applause. He said that it was in the capacity of member for that great city that he intended to address to the meeting a few words in support of the following resolution, which he should propose:—

That in the opinion of this meeting the arrangements made for this exhibition should be upon a scale commensurate with the importance of the occasion, and the large funds requisite for this purpose ought to be provided by the voluntary contributions of individuals rather than from the public revenue.

The former part of the resolution stated it to be the opinion of the meeting that the preparations made for the contemplated exhibition should be on a scale commensurate with the importance of the occasion; and when he adverted to the importance of the occasion, he thought he should be giving a very inaccurate view of its importance if he were to say that the project in view was the object of the Government; or if he were even to say, that it was the object of the nation; and he would only be giving a true and adequate account of the occasion, by stating that it was an object beneficial to all nations. (Applause.) What they had to do was to bring into one view those various productions of manufactures and science which might show how much skill and industry had been able to effect, and in what manner those productions might be carried to perfection. That was an object in which all nations had an interest: and the English people would benefit not themselves merely, but all the inhabitants of the globe, if they succeeded in effecting the object in view. (Hear, hear.) It frequently occurred that there were brought under his consideration inventions exhibiting great skill, and displaying very often great science, which were for the express purpose of increasing the means by which men might destroy one another. It happened continually that he heard, for instance, that in one country means had been discovered by which men might be killed at three or four times the distance hitherto possible; that in another country an invention had been hit upon with respect to the musket, enabling the soldiers to fire six times in a period wherein before they had only been able to discharge their muskets once; and that in another place discoveries had been made by which it was said that a ship could in a few minutes be so injured that the whole of the crew must perish in a very short time. Such were the inventions they continually heard of from different parts, and when every country, careful of its independence, was obliged to imitate and adopt; and those who made the inventions reaped rewards from the different Governments they served. But, with respect to the contemplated exhibition, the object was to show how the arts and benefits of peace were to be improved; to show that, while some men were carrying to great perfection the arts of destruction, there were others who taught how mankind might have better and cheaper articles of clothing, how every house might be better furnished, and how people might be able to communicate with one another from the most distant parts of the world, and reciprocate all those things which improve, civilise, and elevate the character of man. (Cheers.) If such, then, were the object, and if he had succeeded in showing that it was no partial, incomplete, or narrow object—he thought they would agree with him in supporting the conclusion of the resolution, viz. that the funds requisite for such a purpose ought to be provided by the voluntary contributions of individuals, rather than from the public revenue. (Hear, hear.) Such was the view taken at the beginning of the enterprise, and such was the view taken by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, who had been justly referred to as the originator of this undertaking. He thought that the meeting would concur in the conclusion that such ought to be the case (hear); and he could feel no doubt that the subscription would fall in a short space from the metropolis, and then from every district in the country—would show that the people were determined to prove, by providing the means for carrying out the very handsome on the largest scale, that they were not unworthy of the great enterprise than undertaken. (Applause.) Those who succeeded in distinguishing themselves at the contemplated exhibition, by their skill, inventions, ingenuity, and by the perfection to which they brought the products they exhibited, would be men whose names would be handed down over the world, and whose men remarkable for effecting objects which must be useful to all mankind (hear, hear); and if such were their character, he did think that their fame ought to be commensurate with that of other benefactors of mankind, for whom the proudest memorials have been raised. (Applause.) Having made these observations, he would conclude by again repeating that it would be as a member for the City that he appeared before them, and that the object in view was one which ought to be dear to the people of the countries of the world. (Cheers.)

Baron De Rutzschild, M.P., who was much applauded when he rose to address the meeting, seconded the resolution with great pleasure, for he was of opinion that the arrangements for the proposed exhibition ought to be on a scale commensurate with the importance of the occasion. After adverting to the great advantages likely to result from the exhibition to arts and manufactures, and the benefits it was calculated to produce by confirming amongst different nations the blessings of peace, he said he had heard it stated that some manufacturers asked what advantage they would derive from showing their products if they did not get the prize? A very complete and practical answer might be given to that question. He was present at the great exhibition in Paris, and heard a variety of orders given for articles there exhibited, and he was convinced that the exhibition now contemplated would have the effect of insuring a great many orders to our manufacturers. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution was carried unanimously, as also was the following, which was proposed by Lord R. Grosvenor, and seconded by Mr. Alderman Sidney:—

That a public subscription be immediately commenced throughout the metropolis, and that, as the undertaking is of a national character, all classes be earnestly solicited to contribute thereto.

The Governor of the Bank proposed the fifth resolution:—

That this meeting pledges itself, individually and collectively, to use its utmost exertions to forward the subscriptions and to promote the success of the exhibition; and that the several bankers of the metropolis be requested to receive subscriptions, and to pay the same into the Bank of England, in the names of the treasurers appointed by the Royal Commission.

Mr. Labouchere, M.P., seconded the resolution:—Though he had listened to the eloquent speeches which had been made with great satisfaction, he confessed he had listened with still greater to the statement just read by the secretary.—[The right hon. gentleman's allusion was to a long list of subscribers' names which had been read to the meeting as one of the interesting documents for the City district, Mr. D. Wire.] He felt that on occasions like the present certain figures of arithmetic were worth all the figures of speech. (Cheers and laughter.) He was, therefore, glad to see that such names were given, by the amount of the subscriptions, that the city of London would come forward with its wonted liberality and spirit, and set an example to others worthy of the scheme now before them. That scheme was, indeed, unexampled in magnitude, novelty, and design. It had been stated with truth, that they owed the original proposition to the intelligent public spirit of the illustrious Prince Albert, who put himself forward on this, as on every occasion likely to conduce to public advantage (Hear.)

Earl Granville supported the resolution, which was carried unanimously; and the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor, for his conduct on the occasion.

In the course of the meeting a long list of subscriptions was read by Mr. Wire, amounting in the whole to upwards of £10,000. It was headed by the names of the Queen and Prince Albert:—Her Majesty the Queen, £1000; Prince Albert, £500.

BURNING OF A PIRATICAL FLEET ON THE COAST OF CHINA.

In our Journal of last week we illustrated and fully described the destruction of Shap-ng-tsai's piratical fleet by the British, in the Gulf of Tonquin. We have since received several additional Sketches of these decisive operations for the suppression of piracy on the Chinese coast; and, accompanying the above, a set of three Sketches, illustrating two attacks by her Majesty's brig Columbine and her Majesty's steamer Fury. The first of these Sketches shows the Columbine attacking a division of Chui-apoo's piratical fleet, fourteen in number, on the night of September 28. The next scene is an action between the Fury steamer and Chui-apoo's fleet, in Pinghoy harbour, on the coast of China, on October 1; and the third Sketch (which we have here engraved) shows the burning of the pirate's fleet at Pinghoy, on the night of October 1, her Majesty's steamer Fury lying at anchor.

Appended to the account in the Singapore Free Press are the following remarks:—

"It must be remembered that it is not the policy of any piratical force to become assailants against vessels of war; but it was a boast—an ill-judged one it has turned out—of Shap-ng-tsai, that he would not fear attacking any of our brigs of war on the station; the fashion of vessels were the only craft he dreaded—from their heavy metal, and their not having to wait for wind; and when we consider the fact of his squadron mounting upwards of 1200 guns, and of good calibre, with 2000 men, his followers, it may be inferred, that, had the Celestials been as expert in gunnery as they are in many other arts, the present affair would not have had so bloodless a termination on our side. It is said, as at Pinghoy on the 1st October, the pirates opened fire long before the guns of the Europeans were within range.

"We may mention here a curious instance which occurred, showing the extent to which the French and Spanish Catholic missionaries have carried their mischief with in this part of Cochin-China, where it is supposed a European vessel never entered before. A party of more than 30 natives were on board the Columbine, a few of them having heads and crosses round their necks. A plate representing the crucifixion was shown them, when with one accord they all devoutly crossed themselves and went down on their knees, and would not rest satisfied until each had kissed the picture! They state that they have seen European priests, but two native ones, and they all came from a village called Fa-long, ten miles off."—Hong Kong Register Extra, Nov. 1.

Inwill be seen, from the report of a public meeting held in the metropolis on Wednesday, and given below, that the interest of the subject of Chinese piracy has received an impetus from the mention there made of it by more than one of the speakers.

BORNEAN PIRATES.

On Wednesday evening a public meeting was held at the London Tavern, convened by the Aborigines Protection and Peace Societies, "to consider the justice of the terms of the handbill, the fearful sacrifice of human life on the coast of Borneo, in July last; and to petition Parliament for the total and immediate abolition of the practice of awarding head-money for the destruction of pirates." On the platform were Mr. George Thompson, M.P., Mr. Joseph Sturge, Mr. J. Humphreys Parry, the Rev. C. B. Cribbin, the Rev. Henry Richards, the Rev. S. F. Woodmer, Mr. Charles Gilpin, Sir Joshua Walmsley, Rev. Dr. Cox, and other advocates of the universal peace movement.

Mr. Joseph Sturge having been called to the chair, read a letter, apologising for non-attendance, from Mr. R. Cobden, M.P.

The Rev. Henry Richards then proceeded to address the meeting, and entered into a lengthened detail of the proceedings in July last, against the Borneon Dyaks of the Sarabus river, in order to prove that the massacre that followed was deserving of public investigation. He maintained that there ought to have been evidence, clear, palpable, unequivocal, and abundant, to justify such a fearful act of wholesale destruction. Well, all the evidence that these Dyaks had engaged, or contemplated engaging in a piratical expedition, was a report brought to Sir J. Brooke while at Sarawak, that the Sarabus and Sakarran tribes designed to make a piratical attack on certain villages in the Rejang. That report, which was brought by their known and hereditary enemies, the Malays, he found was never substantiated. There was also another report that they threatened to massacre the inhabitants of a small town called Palo, unless they supplied them with arms. There was, however, one more fact against them which he ought to state. They also sent a message to Rajah Brooke, telling him he was an old woman. (Laughter.) This was literally the whole of the evidence given by the perpetrators themselves of the grounds on which this tremendous massacre was committed. To show that it was a cold-blooded massacre, and not a struggle with combatants in a degree equally matched, he read a variety of extracts from the accounts of the officers engaged. Mr. Vigors, a member [illegible], had sent the following extract to the Illustrated London News:—

During the absence of the boats, numbers of the pirates who had escaped in the action, but were not aware of our still occupying the river, were cut off by the Dyak boats in attempting to pass the Sarebus. I then had a spectacle of horror, from the operation of preserving the heads. The Dyaks, having killed their enemy, immediate y cut his head off with a handy bill; they then scoop out the brains and suspend the head by the hair from a rod of bamboo (as represented in the Sketch). They then ignite a slow fire underneath, and the smoke ascends through the neck, and preserves the head, thoroughly drying the inside. It is then placed in a basket of very open work, and carried suspended from the belt of the captor, more highly prized than ornaments of gold or precious stones. On one occasion I saw five heads on a platform undergoing the operation; and within two feet of it the Dyaks were coolly cooking [illegible] cups for their dinner, and inhaling the mingled perfume of baked human [illegible]

A provincial paper says that an exciseman, a short time since, when Prince Albert was shooting in the vicinity of Bagshot, demanded his certificate. The Prince, surprised at the application, referred the official to his aide-de-camp, Colonel Grupps, and the result has been that his Royal Highness has since duly qualified himself to sport over the Royal preserves.

On a portion of the South Staffordshire Railway, in the vicinity of Wednesbury, the seam of coal works out near the surface. During the formation of the line, the men employed in a cutting, thirty feet deep, came upon the old working of a mine; and, latterly, a fire has broken out in the cutting, immediately in front of the line. A number of navvies are at present employed in putting out the fire, which is perfectly red-hot.

A right took place last week at Sevenhampton, when a man named Cook was killed by a blow from a companion named Franklin, the father of the latter urging his son to the fray. Both the Franklins, and a third man, named Fatcher, have been committed for trial under a verdict of manslaughter.

The celebrated sculptor Bartolini died at Florence on the 20th ult., aged 77, after a short illness of three days.

The Inverness Courier gives the history of a pair of bagpipes which have been played in boat town during the Christmas holidays. They were manufactured about a hundred years ago for the Duke of Gordon, and have been since in 33 military engagements in Canada, Egypt, and the Continent.

Mrs. Catherine Hunter, housekeeper to the Lord Bishop of Waterford, was accidentally burned on Saturday evening in her own room in the Palace by her clothes taking fire, and the injuries were so great that she survived the distressing occurrence only three hours.

A library is about to be formed for the use of the clerks of the Bank of England. It is meant to be one of circulation, and to embrace productions of general interest—not absolutely excluding novels, but preferring works which instruct as they amuse. It is believed that the sum will exceed £1000. Its formation by a grant of money so liberal, that a yearly subscription of a few shillings only from each of the employés will be sufficient.

On Friday evening week, an extensive building belonging to the Eastern Union Company, used for the purpose of an engine-house, and which contained at the time three of the company's best engines, was discovered to be on fire. A fire-engine was speedily on the spot, but could do nothing towards arresting the progress of the flames, and the loss of the company can hardly be reckoned short of £2000.

In the ecclesiastical news of the diocese of Peterborough, we find the resignation of the living of Peabark, in that diocese, by the Bishop of Gloucester, and Bristol, who has held it up to the present time since he was Dean of Peterborough. The living is of the value of £625 a year, and is in the gift of the Dean and Chapter at that cathedral, who have bestowed it on the Rev. Dr. James, one of the canons.

As Charles Prothero, Esq., Mrs. Prothero, and some friends were driving near Crindau (Monmouthshire), on Friday evening week, during the fog, the vehicle was drawn too close to a ditch, and overturned into a ploughed field. The coachman and footman were flung some distance with violence, the former being slightly hurt, but the ladies and others of the party escaped without injury, the escape being, under the circumstances, peculiarly fortunate. The horses were not materially hurt, but the carriage was very much broken.

During the evening, tables were prepared with books open for the reception of the names of persons desirous of entering the Freehold Land Society, to qualify as 40s. freeholders, and the officers received great numbers of names.

A Free Trade demonstration took place on Tuesday evening at Exeter, when Mr. Divett and other gentlemen addressed a large company, who had assembled to congratulate each other on the success of Free-Trade, and to discuss the subject of further reforms.

REFORM AND FREE-TRADE MEETING AT NORWICH.—On Tuesday evening a meeting of the reformers of Norwich was held in St. Andrew's Hall, which was quite filled, it having been announced that Mr. G. Thompson, M.P., Mr. H. T. Atkinson, Mr. Wilkinson, and other gentlemen connected with the National Reform Association, would be present. At the Protectionist meeting held on the previous day at Swaffham, a challenge was issued by the committee of the local Reform Association to the persons who attended the requisition, calling on them to attend the Free-Traders' gathering, for the purpose of discussing the principles of the system of Protection. Mr. Sheriff Colman was called to the chair, and Mr. Tillett moved the first resolution, which was to the effect—"That the abundance and cheapness of bread is one of the greatest blessings a nation could enjoy, and that the present attempt of the landowners in this country to lessen its supply or increase its cost, is a most flagrant act of injustice towards all classes of the people."—Mr. J. Colemen seconded this resolution, and the assembly was then addressed at considerable length by the Rev. E. Gladstone, who contended that Free-Trade had not fulfilled any of the expectations which had been formed regarding it, and that a return to Protection was necessary in order to enable Englishmen to run the race equally with foreigners.—Mr. G. Thompson, M.P., having replied in an able address, the resolution was supported by Sir F. Boswell, and, when put to the meeting, was carried unanimously. Another resolution, advocating the adoption of economy in every department of the State, also passed unanimously, and the meeting separated.

THE HIGH TIDE OF TUESDAY.—The high tide which on Tuesday caused so much damage along the banks of the Thames, produced similar disastrous results on a large portion of the eastern coast. The Medway, like the Thames, was much swollen; the water overflowed the banks, and inundated a large piece of country. At Ipswich, it was the highest tide that had been experienced for many years. At Lynn, the tide rose to an alarming height, and the whole of the lower portion of the town near the river was inundated. Boston experienced a similar flooding, and a serious quantity of property is reported to The Humber had its share of the high tide. It rose to 29 feet 7 inches by the Humber dock gates, and before high water the lower part of Hull was inundated. Similar accounts of the disastrous effects of the tide have been received from many other places on this part of the coast.

The Sheffield Reform Association held their first annual meeting on Tuesday evening, in the Town-hall. There was a very numerous and highly respectable attendance. The report of the secretary gave a very cheering account of the society's transactions. It is stated that the society had its origin in the peculiar course taken by some of the Reform party in the West Riding elections in December, 1848, and in the primary object of which was the proper registration of voters. Although an independent society, they had contributed to the Central Association at Leeds the sum of £50 towards the expenses of the registration of general registration of the West Riding also, and a like sum for 1850. Attention to the registration has been attended with signal success, 999 having been added in the Liberal interest, 109 of whom were in the Sheffield district. The expenses attending the Liberal registration of the Riding last year had diminished from £1500 (the outlay in former years) to £454.

CAPTURE OF HIGHWAYMEN.—For some time past the neighbourhood of Bristol has been infested by a notorious gang of highwaymen, known to the police under the appellation of the "Hanham and Cook-road Gang." To such an extent have their depredations been carried, more especially in the rural districts of Brislington and Keynsham, that many of the farmers are now afraid to attend, as usual, our corn and other markets, several outrages having recently been committed, attended with a great degree of personal violence. A Mr. Thomas White, a gentleman farmer, residing at Keynsham, on his way within a few hundred yards of a farm-house on the Frome-road, by two armed men, who demanded his money or his life; they dragged him off his horse and commenced rifling his pockets. He shouted for assistance, upon which they struck him down with a bludgeon, and robbed him of all his loose cash; his notes, which he had placed in a private pocket, fortunately escaping their notice. Mr. Joseph Wyatt, farmer, of Wick, was attacked by the same villains, and knocked down and robbed of all he had about him; the highwaymen also cut his bridle reins and stirrups, to prevent his pursuing them. Mr. Wilkins, of the Bell Inn, Chelwood, Somerset, was waylaid by two men at the bottom of Knowle-hill, who dragged him from his horse, and off in the direction of Keynsham. About an hour later, the same evening, Mr. Barrow, a blacksmith and farrier, who carries on business at Keynsham, was stopped and, although he resisted, till he was severely beaten, robbed of 25s. from his mouth and nostrils, he was robbed of £5. By the exertions of policeserjeant Hazell, five of the gang, named Samuel Briant, William Powell, William Gunning, Samuel Gunning, and John Spring, have been apprehended, four of them has turned approver, and some bludgeons have been found by the police at a spot indicated by him. The prisoners were examined on Saturday last and remanded, and it is stated that a great number of cases will be brought home to them. Subsequent to their apprehension, another man, named Joseph Britzan, was taken into custody, and also the keeper of a beer-shop in the vicinity of Hanham, named Eli Trenlett, at whose house the police have received information, the gang used to meet. Great satisfaction was expressed by a host of farmers, who were present at the examination, at the capture of these desperate villains

FIVE LIVES LOST IN PLYMOUTH SOUND.—A fatal boat accident occurred on Saturday afternoon, by which five persons have lost their lives. Her Majesty's steam-frigate Stromboli, Commander Lord Amelius Beauclerk, having been cruising in the Channel to assist in protecting the entrance of the port on Friday, and took up her moorings just inside the western arm of the Breakwater. On Saturday afternoon, at half-past one o'clock, the Stromboli's cutter was despatched on duty from the Sound to Plymouth Dockyard. This cutter, which is 32 feet long, was in charge of Mr. Whitcombe, naval cadet, and a crew of nine hands: viz., R. Gannycliff (coxswain), John Welsh, John Lowry, Thomas Wenham, Samuel Harris, Joseph Mildren, and Thomas Pinkham, able seamen, and two ordinary seamen, Richard Friend, first-class boy. Besides the crew there were passengers Mr. E. M. Stone, purser and paymaster; Mr. Robert Lonny, assistant-surgeon; and Mr. Davies, naval cadet. Tide then half in three-quarters flood, and very fresh from W.N.W. to N.W., fresh breeze and squally. The cutter carried a single reefed lugsail and mizen; and, having beaten up to the eastern end of Drake's Island, has passed the reserve ship Queen Wilhelmina Commander Grandy, R.N. (Lieutenant Westbrook), which were lying between the island and the "Rusty Anchor," at Mulbay. When the cutter had nearly passed Drake's Island, and Lieutenant Westbrook had returned on board his ship, the cutter was capsized. The boat was completely bottom upwards, and in the course of a few minutes Gannycliff, put her about and righted her, but she quickly filled, and went down instantly. Other boats happened to be near at hand, and the garrison market-boat was also immediately manned by some of the soldiers on Drake's Island, and put off. The assistance was too late, however, to save the lives of all, and five persons were drowned, viz. Mr. Whitcombe, son of a solicitor, residing at Hillfield House, near Gloucester; John Welsh, a native of Queenborough; John Lowry, from Belfast; Thomas Wenham, born at Witnesham, in Kent; and James Fox, whose friends reside in London.

SIR HELEN'S DEFALCATIONS.—The examination of the defaulters, John and William Johnson, was held on Monday, in the Town-hall, Sir Helen, before Mr. R. Neilson, chairman; Mr. W. Pilkington, Mr. W. H. Brancker, and Rev. I. R. Evans, magistrates. Mr. Aspinall, barrister, of Liverpool, appeared on behalf of the prosecution; and Mr. Taylor, solicitor, of St. Helen's, defended Mr. John Johnson; Mr. Whitby appearing on behalf of Mr. William Johnson. Three informations had been laid against the prisoners; two charging them with embezzlement, and the other with conspiracy. Mr. Aspinall only proceeded upon one charge, namely, against Mr. John Johnson for receiving £300 from a friendly society, and not accounting for it; and against Mr. William Johnson for being an accessary after the fact. Sufficient evidence having been offered, the Chairman said, that in the case of John Johnson he should not confine to the determination to refer the question of bail on the charge of embezzlement to a higher tribunal, to the judge of a superior court; and, at the same time, should that judge be disposed to take bail for the embezzlement, the Court would immediately entertain any application for bail for the conspiracy, it being committed on the two counts. With regard to William Johnson, the Court had determined to require bail to the amount of £200 for himself, and two sureties of £250 for being accessary after the fact; and a further bail, himself in £500, and two others in £25 each, for the charge of conspiracy. The Court had next taken into consideration the voluntary assignment made of the whole of the property belonging to the two prisoners—the one in the event of the other not being sufficient to cover the defalcations; and the bench therefore felt that the bail mentioned would be sufficient to mark the course of justice, and allay any feeling in the public mind with regard to the loss of those who were depositors at the bank

At St. Michael's church, Cambridge, the damage done by the late calamitous fire (November 11) is found, upon a careful examination by Mr. Scott, the architect, to be such as to require very serious and extensive repairs, including not only the entire restoration of the roof, but considerable strengthening of the walls.

DEATH OF LORD JEFFREY.

THE melancholy intelligence of the death of this distinguished man of letters was received on Sunday, by electric telegraph: from Edinburgh, where his Lordship expired at six o'clock on Saturday evening, in the seventy-seventh year of his age.

Francis Jeffrey was the eldest son of the late Mr. George Jeffrey, who held the office of an "under clerk" in the Court of Session in Scotland, and whose wife was Henrietta, daughter of Mr. Loudoun, of Lanarkshire. Lord Jeffrey was born in a portion of the Old Town of Edinburgh, called the Lawn-market [illegible] 23rd of October, 1773, not far from the spot where Hume the historian was born. Mr. Jeffrey received the early portion of his education at the High School in his native city, and in the year 1787 went to the University of Glasgow; here he remained till 1791, in which year he was admitted of Queen's College, Oxford. Throughout his school and university studies, his industry and talents were strikingly apparent; and he entered upon life with brilliant prospects. Soon after he had fixed his residence in Edinburgh, his political predilections became developed on the popular side. The Speculative Society, and the Select Society, in which Lord Brougham and Francis Horner took active parts, witnessed the early trials of Jeffrey's yet immature talents. The debates of those associations his speeches were almost as much distinguished by brilliancy of imagination and felicity of expression as even the more elaborate and better considered productions of his middle age.

The great distinction by which Francis Jeffrey will be known to posterity, is, that for more than a quarter of a century he conducted the Edinburgh Review. Of his connexion with this celebrated work, we find the following interesting record in the life of his friend Smith:—

> When first I went into the Church I had a curacy in the middle of Salisbury Plain. The squire of the parish took a fancy to me, and requested me to go with his son to reside at the University of Glasgow before we could proceed to Oxford. Syntax became the seat of war, and in time of politics we put in to Edinburgh, where I remained five years. The principles of the French Revolution were then fully adhered, and it is impossible to conceive a more violent and democratical state of society. Among its first persons were Henry Brougham (since ennobled as Lord Brougham (late Lord-Advocate for Scotland) and Lord Brougham; all of them were members of Brougham and Jeffrey, little thought for the dynasty of Jeffrey that then exercising supreme power over the northern division of the island. Overley we happened to record the Fox-Sydney Smith controversy, the elevated reviewers, and the [illegible] Jeffrey. I proposed that we should set up a Review, this was seconded in with acclamation. Mr. Brougham undertook, and undertook well, the Edinburgh Review, and still the first number of the Edinburgh Review The motto I proposed for the Review was—
> "Tenui musam meditamur avena."—
> We cultivate literature upon a little oatmeal.

But this was too near the truth to be admitted, and so we took our present grave motto from Publius Syrus, of whom none of us had, I am sure, ever read a single line, and so began what has since turned out to be a very important and influential work. When I left Edinburgh, I settled into the stronger hands of Lord Jeffrey and Lord Brougham, and resolved the highest point of practical Parliamentary success.

Lord Brougham soon followed Smith to London, when the sole responsibility and much of the fame of the Editorship fell to the share of Francis Jeffrey. He was more concerned in the literature than in the politics of the Edinburgh Review, and published many articles upon its table and criticism. Light literature and poetical dogmas, than in those weighty affairs to which Mackintosh, Smith, and Brougham, in its earlier years; or Macaulay, Empson, and Hallam, in its more recent days have contributed the weight of their learning and eloquence. Nothing could exceed the versatility of Jeffrey's critical acquirements. "At one time, he was," says a contemporary, "discoursing the matters and poetic politics of taste; next the miscellaneous works of Jonathan Swift; then the writings of Madame de Staël and Samuel Richardson, or Victor Alfieri, and the life of Christopher Columbus, then the dramatic works of John Ford, the characters of Shakespeare's plays, the poetry of Burns, Campbell, Scott, Crabbe, Rogers, Moore, Southey, Wordsworth, and Hemans. In a succeeding quarter, perhaps, he would engage the attention of his readers with the philosophy of Reid or Brown, of Dugald Stewart or Dugald Stewart's end with the novel-writers of the age amongst whom the author of 'Waverley' necessarily occupied his pen and stimulated his powers of investigation—he dealt by the score or hundred."

Lord Jeffrey has left us a precise account of the share he took in the management of the Review. In the preface to his contributions, reprinted from that journal at the close of 1843, he says—"I wrote the first article in the first number of the Review, in October, 1802; and sent my last contribution to it in October, 1840! It is a long period to have persevered in well—or in ill doing! But I was by no means equally alert in the service during all the intermediate time. I was his editor from 1803 till late in 1829, and, during that period, was no doubt a large and regular contributor." On his election to the office of Dean of the Faculty of Advocates, Lord Jeffrey withdrew at once and altogether from the management. He wrote nothing for the Review for a considerable time subsequent to that period, and in fourteen years sent but four papers to the work, none of them on political subjects. Among the less agreeable records of Lord Jeffrey's connexion with the Review, are his cruel wish Mr. Moore, the poet; and the lines to which it gave rise in Lord Byron's "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers."

The forensic career of Lord Jeffrey was slow, but sure. His was admitted an advocate of the Scottish bar in 1794. For some years he had to bear that delay in his advancement which so many members of his arduous profession have to undergo, and which perseverance and real ability can alone surmount. Once past this probation, and due opportunity afforded him, he soon found proof of his merit, and took his station among the most eminent of Scotland's lawyers.

Indeed a jury, Jeffrey was almost irresistible. Quickness and clearness of conception, strength, energy, and beauty of language, aptness and variety of illustration, and a thorough familiarity with the law—these were his characteristics: and, with such, his advocacy found scarcely a rival. The scene of his greatest triumphs lay in the Criminal Court. It will long be remembered in that court with what a feeling, on the trial of a person charged with poisoning his wife, Jeffrey was heard to open a speech by admitting it as proved that his client had intended the murder, and was therefore an abandoned villain; though, on the strength of this very admission, he afterwards went on to show that the actual crime had not been committed, and succeeded in obtaining a verdict from the jury. In the "Scots Trials," the name of Jeffrey appears as leading counsel for the defence of Neal Douglas, a Universalist preacher, for sedition, whose main offences, according to the charge, were his having compared George the Third to Nebuchadnezzar, and the Prince Regent to Belshazzar. In this somewhat absurd prosecution, Mr. Jeffrey spurned the verdict of "not proven" conceded by the Solicitor-General, and won from the jury an immediate and unanimous declaration that his client was "not guilty," which, in Scottish law, is a complete exculpation. Mr. Jeffrey was, in fact, the great Whig lawyer and advocate of his day in Scotland, and may be fairly placed in juxtaposition with Erskine, Brougham, and Denman in England.

In 1821 Mr. Jeffrey was chosen Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow; and in 1828, Dean of the Faculty of Advocates.

On the accession of the Whigs to power in 1830, Mr. Jeffrey became Lord-Advocate: he had previously taken his seat in Parliament, first for a Scottish borough, and then for Malton. He afterwards represented the city of Edinburgh. Like many eminent counsel, he made no great effect in the House, which may have probably resulted from the over-preparation that his practice at the bar had led persons to form. In 1834, Mr. Jeffrey ascended the judicial bench as a Lord of Session; and, according to the rational custom of Scotland, which will have a Judge called a Lord both in and out of the court, he assumed the titular designation of Lord Jeffrey. As a Judge, Jeffrey was in his element again; his reputation spread far and wide, and his court was crowded with suitors. The cruelties which gracefully upon one of such eloquence, integrity, and knowledge; and the sun of his brilliancy as an advocate and writer, set in the subdued but sterling splendour of his excellence as a Lord of Scotsnna's Justiciary.

Lord Jeffrey was married twice: first, in the year 1802, to Catharine, daughter of the Rev. Dr. Wilson, of St. Andrew's; and secondly, in the year 1813, to Charlotte, daughter of Mr. Charles Wilkes, of New York, and grand-niece of the well-known Alderman John Wilkes, of London.

THE LATE LORD JEFFREY.

The author of "Sketches of the Scottish Bar" has portrayed Lord Jeffrey as "of low stature; but his figure, which he tried to set off to the best advantage, was elegant and well-proportioned. His features were continually varying in expression, and were said to have baffled our best artists. The face was rather elongated, the chin deficient, the mouth well-formed, with a mingled expression of determination, sentiment, and arched mockery. The eye was the most peculiar feature of the countenance; it was large and sparkling, but with a want of transparency."

INSTALLATION OF THE BISHOP OF NORWICH.

On Thursday week (January 24), the solemn inauguration of Dr. Hinds, the sixty-fourth Bishop of the diocese, and the thirty-third since the Reformation, took place at the Cathedral in Norwich. The ceremony excited considerable interest; St. Peter's Church bells rang joyously in the morning, and the attendance of the clergy was very numerous. The ceremonial is well described in the Norfolk Chronicle, whence we quote the following.

At half-past one o'clock, the Mayor (H. Woodcock, Esq.) and about twenty members of the Town-Council assembled at the Free-school, and from thence went in procession, preceded by the municipal insignia, to the Cathedral. About the same hour, a large number of the clergy assembled at the Clerical-ooms, and from thence they walked to the Bishop's palace, where the Bishop was ready to receive them in the drawingroom, which was soon filled with members of the clerical body.

The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean, on behalf of the clergy, read an address, congratulating his Lordship on his arrival upon the scene of his episcopal labours; and, after referring to the late excellent Bishop, wishing his successor long and happily to preside over the diocese.

The Lord Bishop replied as follows:—"My Reverend Brethren,—The occasion, of which you have so kindly availed yourselves to welcome me into the diocese, is one that cannot but awake many a serious and anxious thought in me as well as in you. I know what I am expected to be, and what I earnestly desire to be—a friend, a counsellor, a father amongst you. But shall I attain unto the grace which alone can make me all this? or, shall I fall short of it? I well know, too, whom you have lost, and whom I am to succeed—one, to whose memory your regrets and your praises are the more honourable, because I believe from my heart that he earned them whilst seeking, zealously and fearlessly, not the praise of men, but of God. Shall I be enabled to tread that narrow path? Shall I lay hold of, or shall I forfeit, the enabling blessing which you have this day invoked from heaven, for my sufficiency. But away with misgivings; we meet, I trust, to partake of a more cheering spirit. Your expressions of hope for me make me hope, and your proffered help and support make me strong; and this because your hope rests, I well believe, not on any supposed ability on my part, or any conscious power on yours, but on Him who has brought us into the sacred relation in which we are henceforward to stand to one another. May this day be an earnest of the future, both for you and for me. May your friendly expressions of good-will towards me, your frank offer of co-operation with me, and, not least, your effusion of sorrow for the loss of him whom I am called to succeed, be an earnest that our Master in Heaven will knit us together to serve Him, will keep us together in his love, and will work with us, within us, and for us, to do his will."

Meanwhile, a vast concourse of people, finding that they could not get admission by the west door, went round to the east end door, which being open, numbers entered and soon filled the choir of the Cathedral. At two o'clock the great west door was opened, when the Mayor and members of the Council entered the sacred edifice. Owing to the state of the weather, a table and chairs were not placed, as on former occasions, outside the west door, but inside, in the nave.

Soon after two o'clock the Bishop came from the Palace, attended by the Chancellor, C. Evans, Esq.; the Registrar, J. Kitson, Esq.; the Proctors, H. Francis, J. Skipper, M. Rackham, Edward Steward, and Henry Hansell, Esqrs.; and about 300 of the clergy; and they stood round the table, at which the Dean and the Rev. Canon Wodehouse had previously taken their seats. Near them stood the High Steward, Lord Bayning; the Archdeacons, J. B. Collyer and T. J. Ormerod; also the Honorary and Minor Canons, the Choristers, and others.

The Senior Proctor, H. Francis, Esq., presented to the Dean the Archdeacon of Canterbury's commission for the installation, and prayed that the Dean would be pleased to take upon himself the execution thereof, and to decree proceedings to be had and done according to the tenor of the same.—The commission was then read by Mr. Kitson, the secretary.

The Dean then rose and said, "I do decree proceedings to be had and done in the business of this installation according to your petition, and the tenor of this mandate."

The Lord Bishop then made his petition to the Dean.

According to the former order of the ceremony, the above should have taken place outside the Cathedral; and the Bishop, having made his petition, should have knocked thrice at the great west door of the church, on the outside (the same being shut), and one of the minor canons should have asked "Who knocked?" And, in reply, the Bishop should have demanded entrance; but, on this occasion, the Bishop had entered without that formality, and the ceremony had proceeded so far, as already described.

The organ now commenced playing, and a procession was formed of the Mayor and Corporation and officers; the choristers, who sang Garland's hymn, "Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire," as they walked towards the choir, followed by the lay clerks, the minor canons, and canons. The High Steward came next in order; then the Lord Bishop, attended by his chaplains (Archdeacon Ormerod and the Rev. R. Eden); his chancellor (C. Evans, Esq.); his registrar (J. Kitson, Esq.); the proctors; and last the clergy, about 300 in number. As they walked slowly towards the choir, they passed on each side of the late Bishop's grave, and avoided walking over it.

When the Bishop reached the choir-door, it was closed, and he knocked thrice. The precentor (the Rev. H. Symonds) said, "Who knocks?" The Bishop said, "I, Samuel Hinds, Bishop of Norwich, elected and confirmed, do ask entrance into the Cathedral Church of the Holy and Undivided Trinity of Norwich." The doors were immediately opened, and the Dean introduced his Lordship into the choir.—Having advanced to the entrance of the episcopal seat or stall, his Lordship took the oath of supremacy and allegiance to the Queen, and of canonical obedience to the Archbishop and the Metropolitan Church of Canterbury.

Then the Dean read the mandate for the installation.

The Dean, taking his Lordship by the hand, led the right rev. Prelate to the throne; and the Bishop having taken his seat, the Dean retired to his own stall, and divine service commenced.

The Rev. G. Carter intoned the prayers. The Rev. Canon Wodehouse read the first lesson, and the Dean the second.

The musical service was Doctor Clarke in F. An anthem was sung with fine effect. The words were extracted from Dr. Hinds' "Sacred Sonnets," and were as follow:—

Come hither. I will show thee the Bride, the Lamb's wife. And he shewed me that great city, the Holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God.—Rev. xxi. 9, 10.

Come hither—angel tongues invite—
Come hither, and behold the sight;
A bridal city, built in heaven,
And bright with glory God has given.

O holy messenger, in vain
My wistful eye to heaven I strain;
I see no city in mid air—
No bridal vision's range and fair.

Come hither, still the angel cried,
See ranking thousands side by side,
Kneeling and worshipping together,
Each calling each beloved brother.

Is this thy bridal city, Lord?
So let me understand thy word;
So cleanse my soul of all its sin,
That I may go and dwell therein!

The music, composed by Mr. Z. Buck, consisting of a quartet, a recitative, and solo, was very ably sung by the choir.

The service being ended, the Lord Bishop returned to the palace, and the congregation, which entirely filled the choir dispersed.

LICHFIELD GRAMMAR-SCHOOL.

This School, which was founded by King Edward VI., has been entirely rebuilt, by public subscription; and is, after a dormitude of many years, again available to the citizens of Lichfield and the Midland Counties.

"The old school-room," says Harwood, "was a large structure, of which there is an engraving in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1794, built, probably, at the time of its foundation, soon after the first charter of incorporation granted to the city." At this School some of the most eminent men of this country received the rudiments of their education. Among the most distinguished were—the elegant Addison; Elias Ashmole; Bishops Smalridge and Newton; five Judges who sat upon the Bench at the same time—the Lord Chief Justice Willes, the Lord Chief Baron Parker, Mr Justice Noel, Lord Chief Justice Wilmot, and Baron Lloyd; Dr. James, Hawkins Browne, David Garrick, and the celebrated Doctor Samuel Johnson.

The present building was commenced in 1849, and is a very elegant design, by Messrs. Johnson and Son, the architects. It is of the Elizabethan style, of rich red brick and ornamental stone. The School is one of the most beautiful-proportioned rooms we ever saw—upwards of 60 feet in length. An oak dado runs round it, and a handsome ceiling adds to the effect. There is a commodious Porch, and a delightful Class-Room and Library. The whole is admirably executed, and is a great ornament to the city. Messrs. Watts and Nadin were the contractors.

The School-House adjoining is a plain and convenient residence, and was erected, in 1692, at the joint expense of the Corporation and Feoffees of the Conduit Lands: this has recently been enlarged and repaired by the latter Trust.

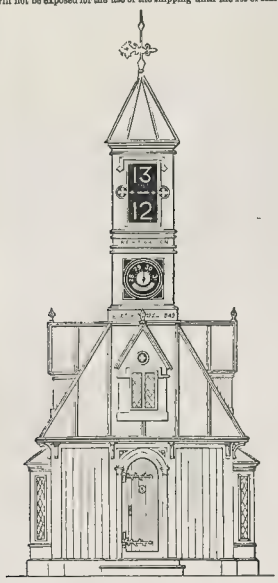
KING EDWARD'S GRAMMAR-SCHOOL, AT LICHFIELD.

The only endowments now payable to the foundation are £13 a year from the Corporation, and £10 19s. 4d. annually from the Exchequer; but the citizens are under much obligation to the munificence of Mrs. Sherratt, of Lichfield, who has given £500 to trustees to apply the interest thereof to the Master.

The Rev. J. C. Bentley, M.A., has been appointed Head Master, and the School is to open on Monday, the 4th of February. The situation is a very healthy one in St. John-street, opposite the Hospital and Church of St. John the Evangelist. The School has a very large play-ground, surrounded by a handsome wall.

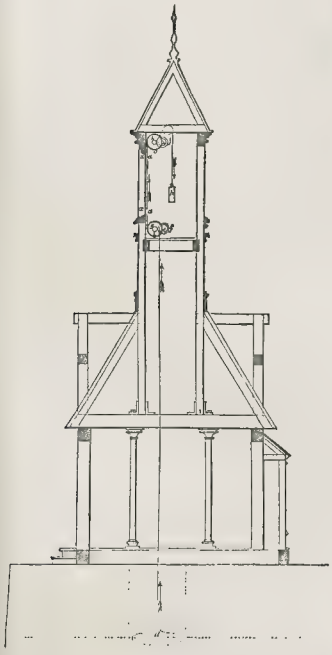
NEW SELF-REGISTERING TIDE-GAUGE AT SUNDERLAND.

THIS apparatus has lately been erected on the South Pier, and is now in working operation; but, owing to the gas not being brought to the Docks, the figures will not be exposed for the use of the shipping until the 1st of March next.



SIGNAL-HOUSE OR TIDE-GAUGE.—ELEVATION OF TOWER.

The inventors of the mechanism are Mr. Meik, engineer to the Commissioners of the River Wear; and Mr. H. Watson, brass-founder, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. It is designed for the use of ships entering or leaving a harbour and other places where a correct and conspicuous gauge is required; the arrangement being also applicable for railway signals and other purposes.



SIGNAL-HOUSE OR TIDE-GAUGE.—SECTION OF TOWER.

In the Illustrations, Fig. 1 is an elevation, and Fig. 2 a section, of a tower, in the upper portion of which the depth of the water on the harbour bar is shown by large figures on a web of wire gauze (a a) of any suitable length, depending upon the range of the tide, and of such a width as to admit figures of any size required. Each end of the web is wound upon copper rollers (b and c), which are made to work by means of a float (d) and balance-weight (h), the wire rope working over a spiral cone (e). At the other end of the axis is a wheel (f) working into a pinion (g); and to the balance-weight (h) is attached a copper wire cord, passing over a guide-sheave to a spiral cone (i), round which it is wound, and the end made fast. At the opposite end of the axle of the cone is a wheel (j) working into a pinion (k) on the axle of the top roller.

When the float (d) rises with the tide, the balance weight (h) moves the whole apparatus in the direction of the arrows; and when the float falls with the tide, the movements are reversed.

As the tide ebbs and flows, the height is indicated on the web opposite the dial or sheet of plate glass x x x, &c.: and that these figures may be made large, and distinctly seen from a great distance, the web is made to travel 4, 5, or 6 to 1 of the float (or any other proportion), by means of the intermediate wheel and pinion f and g; and these figures, which are here made to indicate the feet and half-feet of the height of the tide, are shown white in the day time upon a black ground; and at night, when lighted in the usual way from the interior, the figure is shown brilliantly illuminated upon an opaque or black ground, a white transparent varnish being used for the figure, and an opaque black for the ground.

An interior Tide Register has also been fitted up in the same building as the Tide Gauge. A well, of very similar construction to the one used for Messrs. Meik and Watson's Tide Gauge, contains a float, attached to a cord of copper wire, which is carried over a circular wheel in the building. This wheel works a rack, in which a pencil is fixed. A sheet of paper, properly ruled and adjusted, is fastened on a roller immediately below this pencil, and receives its tracings, which form the diagram. This paper is large enough to admit a register of high and low water, and the time of each, for fourteen days. A dial, on one side of the rack, is worked by the float and cord coming from the well below, and marks, as a clock does, the hours and minutes of the day, and the feet and inches of high and low water. A certain means is thus afforded, at any moment, of testing the accuracy of the register worked by the pencil. A time-piece, on the other side of the rack, and opposite the dial, gives, by means of a strong minute-hand, the revolving motion to the cylinder on which the paper is rolled, and fixes the time of the tide's variations. Thus, the cord and float show the various depths of water, and the time-piece the exact hour and minute of each variation.

SCHOOL OF DESIGN.

IN our Journal for January 19 we reported the distribution of the Prizes at the Government School of Design, at Somerset House, on the 16th. We now engrave two of the productions:—1. The first prize pattern for Paper-hanging, one of the six prizes gained by Miss Alice West. 2. One quarter of a pattern for Silk Damask, by Mr. Slocombe.

We annex a few judicious observations on the Exhibition, from the Journal of Design for the present month:—

"Many of the drawings were of high merit as copies, others as compositions showed thought and careful training. The works of the female school, which were exhibited, very properly, in a room by themselves, were especially noticeable for feeling and elegant manipulation. In the designs, too, there was more freshness and originality than was to be found in the attempts in the same direction in the male classes. Of ornament, as based on a re-construction of natural types, there was scarcely a symptom; but of flowers arranged and bearing in that direction, some of the designs by the feminine students were excellent: there was, however, generally, a naïve innocence of all practicality. Still there was something in these specimens of female ability which practical men might turn to good account. In the male classes there was not that vigour which might be expected from the theory of basing education in ornament on a knowledge of the figure, for much of the ornament was feeble in its details. We must not forget, however, that we are dealing with the works of students, and not with those of masters. In actual manufacture there were a few specimens of Honiton lace of a superior character, designed in the School, as also some Brussels carpeting of no great excellence. Some of the studies of floral subjects were good, and the outlines of flowers from nature indicated the true road, as yet dimly seen. Some of the models, both copies and designs, were highly creditable; nor should the architectural and ornamental outlines be overlooked, as in general they possessed merit."

In our report, page 44, for "Lord Grenville," read "Lord Granville."

THE FEAR OF THE WORLD; OR, LIVING FOR APPEARANCES.

BY THE BROTHERS MAYHEW,

Authors of "The Greatest Plague of Life," &c.

CHAPTER X.

THE thought had never for one moment entered the barrister's head that Reuben might refuse to oblige him. The way in which he had almost forced the loan of one hundred pounds upon him, was to him a proof that the poor ignorant country farmer would be delighted to serve his dashing brother-in-law. It was only when Nicholls was within a mile or two of Reuben's house that he saw there might be any difficulty in the case. The nearer he got to his destination, the faster and faster the difficulties seemed to rise. In fact, at last he thought the whole journey to be so useless, that he had almost determined on returning to town, and so avoid the unpleasant wound his vanity would receive should his brother-in-law refuse the request he almost considered it an honour to make to him. But the vision of that man in the parlour, and the thoughts of the evening party, were so dreadful, that he felt that, as a husband and a father, he ought not to leave a single stone unturned, though a Stonehenge should stop the way.

Directly Reuben saw his brother-in-law advancing to the house, picking his way, tip-toe, among the straw and litter of the farm-yard, his whole attention centred on his polished leather boots, he pretty nearly guessed the cause that had brought him to Farnham.

"Hollo, missus, here be Nicholls again," he cried to his wife, as he laid down his pipe, and snatched up his broad hat. "Sally maun be a rare lass for mil'nery. Dang it, he be frowning uncommon tight. Ho, Nicholls! be Sally with you?"

Nicholls, who well knew that the simple farmer's shrewdness would at once penetrate the object of his coming, if he again gave the counterfeit of pleasure to a mere business visit, had determined to play, for a change, an open part with him, and to tell him at once, and without needless preface, the object of his journey. So the young barrister did not disguise the looks of deep anxiety natural to his circumstances, and pressed the horny hands of his brother-in-law with a convulsive grasp.

"My dear, dear Reuben, I am glad to see you looking so well," said Nicholls, with a sigh like the boiling of a kettle. Then, as his downcast eyes rested on the splashes upon his boots, he added, "It's a wicked world, Reuben, but I'm glad to see you looking so well."

"And I be fidgetty to see thee here with that face, like veal, it be so white. Come along in: my missus is all of a flurry to see thee here again, without a word of writing or nothing."

"It's but a flying visit. I haven't a moment to spare; and—and I come on important business, Reuben," continued Nicholls, nervously, as he followed "that clodhopper" of a brother-in-law into his farm-house. Reuben's missus did not receive Nicholls with any show of warmth. Too simple to mimic what she did not feel, and too shrewd to be blind to the terms on which she was patronised by her rich connexions, she spoke abruptly to the friend of Lady Verulam, and then turned again to the stocking she was knitting.

Reuben and Nicholls sat down, and an awkward pause ensued, for each party could read the feelings of the other. Nicholls moved about on his seat, cleared his throat, adjusted his collar, and remarked on the failure of the barley crops, while Reuben eyed him, not with an ill-natured expression exactly, but with a look of mingled curiosity and pity, for he felt for the struggle which he could read in the bosom of his would-be rich relation, who was a second time a petit jouer for his bounty. And then Reuben's thoughts wandered back to the drawing-room of the St. John's Wood house: he remembered his sister's icy decorum, and the frigidity that had made him prefer the sanded floor of a neighbouring tavern to her rich carpeted room; and, though he was a good-hearted, honest fellow, he could scarcely repress a chuckle when he called to mind the words he had whispered to Sally at parting, telling her that one of these fine days she would be glad enough to find a quiet home with her uncouth brother. The verification of his prophecy was at hand, and he was secretly pleased (all men are delighted with success) that his forebodings were on the eve of realisation.

"My dear Reuben," said Nicholls suddenly (he had gained the mastery over himself by recollecting that the return train started in two hours, and there was no time to be lost), "I am quite rapidly), "I have come to ask you a great favour. I am at a loss to express how deeply sensible I remain of past favours; how both myself and Sara, who, by the way, sends her love to you and your good lady;" and he smiled condescendingly at Molly, who worked then harder than ever——

"My missus is it thee means?" interrupted Reuben, with a half chuckle.

"Yes. Well, my dear Reuben, I will confide in you. I am in a great difficulty, and have only come to you as a last resource. I have tried all other means, and failed."

Here Mr. Wellesley's words paused, and gave another sigh, while Reuben, with an unmoved countenance, looked him full in the face, but spoke not a word. At last, with another effort, the gentleman turned upon his vulgar, ill-bred relation, and begged the loan of one hundred and sixty pounds, to save him from disgrace and ruin.

When Reuben heard the amount required he gave a loud shrill whistle, plunged his hands into his breeches' pockets, and looked across at his spouse, who, turning to Mr. Nicholls, said, in a tone of cutting sarcasm—"Be't for mil'nary agin, eh?" and then went to work again at her stocking, with an ardour that threatened false stitches at every turn she took.

"Harkee," said Reuben, after a pause, as he calmly proceeded to fill his pipe, and pour out a mug of ale for his visitor, "Harkee, Nicholls, I be plain and blunt in all my dealin's. I be rough in speech and manners, but I ha'e pride, dang it, I ha'e! Since thee left my roof, thee and thy wife and the babbies, not so much as a word ha'e we had from thee; but directly thee be in a mess, back thee come, like hungry hounds hunting from Muster Wellesley Nicholls, o' Hyde-park. Last time thee only came here to hide theesel' as a sort o' runaway; and I lent thee—with all my heart, as my missus knows—lent thee a hundred pounds out of my savings. Nicholls, I'd willingly do the like agin; but I feel that I should be the ruin of thee. Sell the lumps of gold off the chairs and tables—make Sally dress becoming to her degree—drink away this, and this (and Reuben pointed to a diamond ring that glittered on Nicholls's finger, and a massive gold chain which he wore about his neck), and then come and live in quiet somewhere hereabouts, and get out of debt: if there'll do this, I'll help thee to my last farthing; but while thee last all these expensive ways, which five hundred pounds won't keep up, thee must'n look for a stiver from Reuben Marsh. I cannot forget that, up to this time, I ha'e been the tool of thee—not a friend. My hands are too hard—my missus's arms are too red—we are too vulgar, to be the friends of thee and thy acquaintance; so thee canst not stoop to be beholden to a poor farmer to keep thee in extravagancies. No, Muster Wellesley Nicholls, Reuben 'll not lend a hundred and sixty pounds, once for all; so don't ask"—and he buried his red face in a huge glass of ale that stood beside him.

Nicholls saw that neither argument nor persuasion would avail; so he took a hasty leave of Mrs. Marsh, and strode through the farm-yard accompanied by Reuben Marsh. Not a word was exchanged as the two crossed the yard. Reuben called to a labourer to tether the cows safely, and to tell Tom that all the oats must be stacked before sunset, with what Nicholls called heartless unconcern. The rough, uncultivated Reuben Marsh, the unlettered, unpolished agriculturist, was, to tell the truth, striving to conceal the emotion that swelled within him. He thought how unkindly Sally would take it when she heard that he had refused her husband's request; but then again he felt that he did all for the best, since sooner or later a crisis must come and put an end to the reckless gilded misery into which the Nicholleses had fallen, and the sooner this took place the better. As they approached the high-road, Reuben broke the silence, saying—

"Thee mus'a't misunderstand me. I would lend thee the money on one condition."

"What's that?" asked Nicholls, eagerly catching at the chance.

"That thee leave matters in my hands, and come and live here, respectable in the country, and give up the folly which is taking thee, as quick as may be, to ruin."

"Thank you, Mr. Reuben Marsh; on such a condition I must decline the loan. Good bye."

"Good bye," said Reuben, seizing Nicholls's hand, "and remember to tell all I have said to Sally, and kiss her for me—and think on what I tell thee; and when thee hast determined to come into the country, write a line, and thee's find a true friend in Reuben Marsh. Good bye."

The two parted. Reuben returned slowly to his farm, while Nicholls hurried forward in a nervous, agitated state of mind, that almost amounted to delirium. He called Reuben a boor, a low ploughman; and, in the depth of his misery, felt humbled and ashamed that he, the son of Sir Giles, had laid himself open to a refusal from a country clodhopper who had the misfortune to be his wife's brother. And then his mind reverted to the scene which he was approaching—to the gaudy house, crammed with dainties for a festival, guarded by a man in possession! Even if he allowed the party to take place, he would not be the less disgraced; for when the company called afterwards to leave their cards, there would be bills headed "Sale by order of the Sheriff" staring them full in the face from the door-posts. How Lady Verulam would have the laugh of them, too! The pastrycook, too! would he leave the supper, if he saw the limb of the law snugly ensconced in the kitchen? No—he felt that he must either postpone the party altogether, and make a precipitate retreat, or in some way contrive to settle the matter. His heart whispered him to retreat from the fight at least with honour; but the world beckoned him on to desperate alternatives. Irresolute, sick at heart, and reckless, he reached his house—a house that in that hour was a hell to him, and, on the morrow, was to contain one hundred and fifty people in holiday guise. He went straightway to Mrs. Nicholls's boudoir, where he found that lady in a state of fashionable anxiety, with her maid sprinkling eau-de-Cologne about the carpet because her mistress had fainted from repeated questions of Mrs. Wellesley Nicholls enveloped in a purple satin robe negligée.

"That will do, Perkins," said Mrs. Nicholls to the servant, as Mr. Nicholls entered the room; "you may go: shut the door. Well, my dear Wellesley, you have settled matters, I suppose."

"Settled matters! Yes, they are settled, clapped upon that!" replied Nicholls, throwing himself into an easy chair, and rapping his knuckles with a quick, energetic movement. "Yes, you are quite right, Sara; matters are settled. You may advertise for a situation as governess or lady's-maid on Monday morning! Your amiable brother would see you starving before he'd stir a finger to help you any hand to save you."

"This is dreadful!" exclaimed Mrs Nicholls, bursting into tears. "How am I to put off the party? My nerves! said he'll be home in the morning; the men are now laying out the supper table—the supper is nearly all here. I have had four of the most respectable greengrocers in the world, who will look as though they had been servants with me from our infancy, the moment they put on their liveries. In short, everything is ready. What will people think? The Lord Chief Baron's set, of course, will cut you, and how you will be talked about at the clubs!"

"It can't be helped! Blame your own vulgar relations, not me," answered Nicholls sharply.

"Well, I'm sure! None of the Royal family happened to pass through Farnham when my father was mayor of that town, certainly," retorted the lady, with a hard thrust at Sir Giles, "but I do not consider myself altogether dirt for all that."

"Your vulgarity is worthy of you," said Nicholls, his lip quivering and whitening with kindling rage, and rising to leave the room.

"Don't, for Heaven's sake, let us quarrel, Wellesley," Mrs. Nicholls interposed, in a gentle voice. "Can nothing ward off the blow? or are we irretrievably disgraced? Are we henceforth outcasts from society? This is worth a struggle. Remember, dearest, if we once lose ton, life will be a barren waste to people of our refined ideas and habits." With this, Mrs. Wellesley Nicholls threw herself back in her chair in a graceful attitude of grief, and, holding a handkerchief of the most delicate texture between her thumb and forefinger, dipped a corner into a cut-glass bottle that was on the table beside her, and gently, very gently, dabbed her temples: it was an affecting sight.

Nicholls sat there, and silently contemplated the majestic proportions, and delicate graceful hands of his wife. Could such a gentle, fragile creature be allowed to pass away her days, unseen and unappreciated, in the country? Was she not born to grace the circles of the noblest in the land? Was not he, too, the son of Sir Giles? Were not the shoulders of Mrs. Nicholls the envy of many ladies of distinction? How slowly quarter-day came round, he thought. It was maddening to know that he should be ruined, when a little delay would make everything smooth again. As his eye wandered listlessly about the room, it accidentally fell upon a letter from Reuben to Mrs. Nicholls, which she had not answered. He fixed his gaze upon it steadily and intently.

Mrs. Nicholls rose and left him to his own reflections, convinced (for he was such a clever creature, and had passed so dexterously through the gravest difficulties) that he only needed reflection to fix upon a plan of deliverance from the clutches of the hateful jeweller. She had scarcely closed the door upon him when he seized Reuben's huge letter, written in a huge round hand, trembling from guiding the plough, and placed it in his pocket.

"They'll take the name of Reuben Marsh with pleasure," he muttered to himself, as he hastily strode backwards and forwards in the room, "and I shall guarantee the next quarter's rent before it becomes due." A smile burst upon the clouded brow of the young man. He had devised means of clearing himself from the jeweller! Thank Heaven! before the world he could still keep up the game the world imposes—he could, "till further notice," continue to perform the hypocrite. Mrs. Nicholls's shoulders need not be thrown away upon vulgar people: they might still be the admiration of people of ton.

In the course of an hour, a bill duly accepted by Reuben Marsh, and made payable at Farnham, was stowed in the iron chest of an accommodating Israelite, and Messrs. Soane and Co. received the amount of Mr. Nicholls's debt, and by the evening Mr. Slomart's jewels was ejected from Mr. Nicholls's superb dressing-room. The man in possession had only been an inmate of Mr. Nicholls's house a day; but so acute were his feelings, that, on leaving, he could not refrain from telling his host, as he pocketed his week's pay, that he regretted parting with Mrs. Wellesley's youngest born, inasmuch as the little dear was just beginning to know him.

When Nicholls returned home from his final interview with Messrs. Soane and Co., he called for a bottle of brandy, sent for a young friend to smoke with him, and made himself extremely merry up to a late hour. As for Mrs. Nicholls, it was late enough before she got to bed. In the first place, she had to watch the servants while they washed the numbers off the furniture; and, secondly, to put 20 wax lights in the back of a chair or in the corner of a glass, and be detected by the company on the following evening; and, in the next place, all the things had been so disarranged by the "disgusting wretches," that it must take her some time to see them put in their proper places again.

The evening of Thursday arrived, and by eleven o'clock, the rooms of Mrs. Wellesley Nicholls were as crowded as Gravesend on a fast day. The shoulders of Mrs. Nicholls were never displayed to better advantage; and Mr. Wellesley Nicholls was in the liveliest possible humour. His flew about the room; now complimenting some hoary dowager on her youthful appearance, and telling some rouged grandmother that the heat of the room had given her quite a hectic flush. At supper, the sponge-cake elephant looked magnificent; and the barley-sugar birdcages elicited loud and continued admiration.

Mr. Wellesley Nicholls was seated at the head of the supper-table, with the Hon. Mrs. Macbeth on his right, and Mrs. Major Calebash on his left. Nicholls was in a delirium of pleasure. He did not spare the wine; and his conversation by degrees became more and more incoherent, and his laughter rang through the room, and was re-echoed in the drawingroom to the astonishment of the company, and to the complete disgust of the ladies. Poor Mrs. Nicholls' shoulders crimsoned with shame to behold her lord and master commit himself in this manner. The company returned to the drawingroom, and dancing recommenced.

Suddenly the doors were thrown open, the servant announced Mr. Isaac Isaacs, and a gentleman with scarcely any neck, a prodigious quantity of hair, and a profusion of jewellery in black coat, walked into the room. His hair was plastered down as though he had recently emerged from a bath; his fingers were covered with rings, and a huge brooch was attached to his neckcloth.

"Mr. Isaacs!" Mrs. Nicholls exclaimed. "I don't remember the name."

"Vish ish your husbhant? he knowsh me," replied the strange visitor with lips like a sea-shell, and whom the entire company were regarding with riveted attention.

"Wellesley, my dear," said the hostess, addressing her husband, and imagining that the visitor must be some great city capitalist, "here is Mr. Isaacs. Pray invite him to sup."

"With pleasure!" said poor Nicholls; and not knowing in his drunkenness what he did, he advanced towards the new-comer.

"Never mind introdushing," replied Mr. Isaacs gallantly, "my arm and ish pure bushineash." And bending over Nicholls's shoulder, he whispered in his ear, "Vhy, hullo! vhere go to another room; I come from Mishter Hedards apout te carpet, you knowsh: I've got some writs for you."

Fired by the wine, Nicholls's indignation at the wary Jew's cunning grew beyond his control. Nearly bursting with passion, he shouted, as he pointed to the door, "Leave this house, fellow! leave the house! How dare you enter this room on such an errand? Where's Parker?" and, as the boy appeared at the door as suddenly as if a spring had been touched, the barrister continued, "Show this man the door."

"Oh! very wall—very well—it doeshn't matter a pit to me—not a pit," answered Mr. Isaacs, nettled at finding his offer of secrecy so disdainfully refused. "Here's a copy of a writ, and here's the original," and he presented the wretched host with a long paper slip, whilst he Leld a parchment one before his eyes.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Market has been heavy during the last week, Money Stock becoming plentiful in consequence of the large sales for delivery which have been made by two of the principal brokers. The price of Consols on Monday was 96¾ to ¾ for money, and the same price was current on Tuesday, except for a short time, when the quotation reached 96⅞. The market, however, closed with more firmness than on the preceding day. An improvement of ⅛ in the opening price on Wednesday was followed by a still further advance, Consols quoting 96⅝, afterwards receding to 96⅜ and 96⅝ for money and time. Several large sales for money on Thursday again depressed quotations, and the market remained heavy during the day. Exchequer Bills are a point lower, and for the New Issue Loan there is no demand. Long Annuities, New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents and Reduced have not been much dealt in, but maintain relatively higher prices than Consols. At the close of business the official quotations gave for Bank Stock, 209½; Reduced, 96⅛; Consols, 96⅛; New 3½ per Cent Annuities, 98⅛; Long Annuities, 19 5-16ths; India Stock, 259; India Bonds, £10.0, 93 p; Ditto, under £1000, 93 p; South Sea Stock, 103⅛; Consols for Account, 96⅛; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 61 p; £500, June, 61 p; Small, June, 61 p.

The Foreign Market has been again active this week, Buenos Ayres, Peruvian, Venezuela, and Ecuador having all been largely dealt in. Buenos Ayres advanced from 83⅞ to 85; Peruvian, from 37½ to 38½; and Venezuela, from 32 to 34 for Account. Russian Scrip is a fraction lower than at the beginning of the week, as well as Portuguese, Mexican, and Spanish stock. Guatemala stock was inquired for on Wednesday, at its nominal rate of 19 to 20, but has not since been quoted. At the close of the week prices stood for—Brazilian Bonds, 85; Buenos Ayres Bonds, Six per Cent, Account, 55; Danish Bonds, 1825, Five per Cent, 99½, Equador Bonds, 4½; Grenada Bonds, One per Cent, 18⅜; Do., Dfrd., 4¼; Mexican 5 per Cents, Account, 20⅜; Do., Coupons, 20⅜; Dutch 2½ per Cents, 59⅝; Ditto, Small, 59¼; Peruvian Bonds, 4 per Cent, 73½; Ditto, Account, 73½; Ditto, Deferred, 39½; Portuguese 4 per Cents, 36½; Ditto, Account, 37¼; Russian Scrip, 94 pm.; Spanish Passive, 16⅛; Ditto, Certificates, 18½; Ditto, Account, 18⅝; Passive, 3⅜; Ditto, 3 per Cent. for Account, 37; Venezuela Bonds, 4 per Cent., 33½; Ditto, Account, 34; French Rentes, 5 per Cent, 94f. 50c.; Exchange, 25f. 45c.; Amsterdam, 12 2; Rotterdam, 12 2.

Share transactions have not been extensive, and little has passed without much activity. There has certainly been an improvement within the last few weeks, as the following comparison will show. The period until after the half-yearly meetings, now closely approaching. The best prices officially quoted are—Aberdeen, 24½; Caledonian, 12⅜; Ditto, New, £10, Preference, 8⅛; Dutch Rhenish, 2½; Eastern Counties, 10½; Ditto, Fifths, 1½; East Anglian, £18, E. and H., 1½; Eastern Counties, ½; Ditto, Extension, 5 per Cent., No. 1, 1½; Ditto, Extension, 5 per Cent., No. 2, ⅝; Ditto, Scrip, ⅜; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 4½; Ditto, Scrip, 1 pm.; Great Northern, 7½; Ditto, A. A, Deferred, 3½; Ditto, A. B, 6 per Cent., 4½; Great Western, 69½; Ditto, Half Shares, 33½; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 14½; Ditto, New, £17, 9½; Lancashire and Yorkshire, Half Shares, 27; Ditto, Fifths, 2½; Ditto, Fifths, 8; Ditto, New, Guaranteed Six per Cent., 12½; London and Blackwall, 3½; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 89½; London and North-Western, 116½; Ditto, New, Quarters, 13⅜; Ditto, Fifths, 14½; London and South-Western, 68; Lowestoft, Guaranteed Four per Cent., 16½; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, Eighth Shares (No. 3), 7½; Midland, 44½; Ditto, £50 Shares, 6⅜; Ditto, Birmingham, Six per Cent., 123½; North Staffordshire, 7½; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 10½; Reading, Guildford, and Reigate, 15½; Scottish Central, 15½; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 4½; South-Eastern, No. 2, 18½; Ditto, Scrip No. 4, 6¾; West Valley, 6 per Cent. Guaranteed, 27½; York and North Midland, Preference, 5½; Boulogne and Amiens, 7½; Dutch Rhenish, 2; Northern of France, 14 dis.; Orleansand Bordeaux, 3½; Rouen and Havre, 10½.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The Consol Market opened yesterday at 96½ to ¾, but soon afterwards receded to 96. News from Greece still further affected it, and 96½ to 96 became the quotation; but a rally towards the close of business left the price 96⅜ to ½. In the Foreign Market Portuguese improved a fraction, and Russian Scrip declined to 3 pm. Shares were not materially affected.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—During the present week the arrivals of English wheat for our market, coastwise, have been confined to 2726 quarters. By land carriage the supply has been trifling. From 70–80 several of Monday's quotations were on offer, and the demand for all descriptions of wheat of home produce was excessively heavy. Where sales took place prices ruled the turn in favour of the buyers. Upwards of 6000 quarters of foreign wheat have come in freely from the near Continental ports. Fine parcels ruled nominally the same as on Monday, all the middling and inferior kinds were 1s per quarter lower to purchase. Barley—the supply of which was seasonably large—was dull in the extreme, and 1s per quarter cheaper. Scarcely a transaction took place in malt. Good sound oats were scarce, and held at late rates. Damp qualities were quite neglected. Beans ruled heavy, at late rates. White peas and Indian corn were 1s per quarter lower. In flour next to nothing doing. Several large parcels have come in from France.

ARRIVALS.—English wheat, 2720; barley, 3610; malt, 4030; oats, 6190; flour, 3110. Irish: wheat, 1470; barley, none; oats, 6270; flour, 4080; oats, 9456; flour, 6000 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 37s to 42s; ditto, white, 42s to 46s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 42s; ditto, white, 41s to 44s; rye, 22s to 24s; grinding barley, 15s to 18s; distilling ditto, 22s to 25s; malting ditto, 32s to 36s; Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 53s to 56s; brown ditto, 48s to 49s; Kingston and Ware, 54s to 57s; Chevalier, 57s to 58s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire ditto, 48s to 51s; potato ditto, 37s to 39s; tick beans and Cork, black, 31s to 32s; ditto, white, 34s to 36s; tick beans, new, 26s to 30s; ditto, old, 28s to 30s; grey peas, 25s to 28s; maple, 26s to 28s; white, 28s to 32s; harlings, 27s to 29s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 39s to 40s per sack; Stockton and Yorkshire, 30s to 33s per 280 lbs. Foreign: wheat, 40s to 44s; barley, 18s to 20s; malt, 34s to 36s; oats, 15s to 17s; beans, 30s to 32s; peas, 32s to 34s per quarter. Flour, American, 21s to 24s per barrel. Baltic, 22s to 23s per sack.

The Seed Market.—So little has been doing in seeds this week, that our quotations remain almost nominal.

Linseed, English, sowing, 54s to 56s; Baltic, crushing, 40s to 42s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 44s to 46s; Hungarian, 38s to 39s per quarter; Coriander, 16s to 22s per cwt.; Brown Mustard-seed, 6s to 8s per bushel; White ditto, 6s to 7s per bushel. Tares, English, 7s to 9s per bushel. Rapeseed, new, £20 to £22 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £9 0s to £9 10s; foreign, £8 10s to £8 15s per 1000. No change in cinquette. Rape cake, £5 5s per ton. Canary, 74s to 80s per quarter. Eagles: Clover-seed, red, —s to —s; extra, —s to —s, white, —s to —s; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; extra, —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 6½d to 7d; of household ditto, 5d to 6d, per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 40s 1d; barley, 32s 9½; oats, 15s 10d; rye, 21s 2d; beans, 31s 7d; peas, 32s 3d.

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 42s 0d; barley, 25s 11d; oats, 15s 9d; rye, 21s 4d; beans, 31s 6d; peas, 32s 3d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 1s 6d; barley, 1s 0d; oats, 1s 0d; rye, 1s 0d; beans, 1s 0d; peas, 1s 0d.

Teas.—The demand for most kinds of tea has considerably fallen off, owing to the increasing arrivals.—1,600,000 lbs having come in this week—and prices are with difficulty supported. Common sound congou, 9½d to 10½d; and common to strong souchongs, 9½d per lb.

Sugar.—Fine parcels of colonial sugar have realised tolerably steady since our last report, at full prices. Refined lumps and loaves have rather declined. Refined goods—the supply of which is increasing—have met a slow inquiry. Brown lumps, 49s to 50s; and standard ditto, 48s to 49s per cwt. No change in syrups.

Coffee.—Native Ceylons have met a very dull sale, at drooping currencies, viz. 59s to 60s per cwt. In other kinds of coffee very few transactions have taken place.

Rice.—Our markets is to-orably firm, and prices are well supported, although the stocks in Circulation are ample.

Provisions.—For the finest foreign butter the demand is steady, on somewhat higher terms in other kinds, only a moderate business is doing. Fine hay Friesland, 88s to 90s; Hostein and Holland, 86s to 88s; and inferior qualities, 80s per cwt. and upwards. We have a moderate inquiry for most descriptions of Irish butter, at fully last week's quotations. Carlow, Kerry, Limerick, 78s; Clonmel and Killarney, 76s to 78s; Cork, 72s to 74s; Waterford, 68s to 70s; Limerick, 60s to 64s. Slane, 68s to 84s; and Tralee, 54s to 56s per cwt. Fine Dorset butter is firm, at 88s to 92s per cwt. The supply of other kinds of English sorts is quite equal to the demand. Fresh is quoted at 9s to 13s per dozen lbs. Prime bacon moves off steadily, on rather higher terms. 1,000 bales of Waterford landed, 48s to 52s; heavy, 45s to 48s; and Limerick sloughs, 43s to 45s per cwt. Irish: sides mild, and have supported the quotations of last week. In cut middles and lard barrel and bags support previous rates.

Tallow.—The market rules heavy, at drooping prices. P Y C, on the spot, has sold at 38s 6d to 38s 9d per cwt; new tallow, deliverable up to Christmas, is offering at 40s per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed has risen in value £3 per ton. In other respects, the demand is very inactive.

Spirits.—Owing to the increasing stock, the demand for brandy is heavy, at barely late rates. In the value of rum and cordials no change to note. No change in corn spirits.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, 4½s to £5 5s; clover ditto, £4 10s to £5 15s; and straw, £1 1s to £1 8s per load.

Potatoes.—3000 bales have come in this week from various quarters. By private contract the demand is firm, and prices are well supported.

Hops.—The duty on hops since having fallen off from abroad and elsewhere, higher prices have been realised on most qualities. Present rates vary from 70s to 120s per cwt.

Hops (Friday).—Since the date of our last report the activity of the demand is steadily fully maintained. Parcels of foreign have also continued to arrive.

New Mid and East Kent pockets, 26 0s to £11 11s; new Weald of kent ditto, £6 3s to £8 0s; new Sussex ditto, £5 10s to £6 12s, new Farnhams, £12 2s to £13 0s; Yearling Kents, £3 3s to £4 4s; Yearling Sussex, £2 8s to £3 3s; old hops, £1 0s to £3 15s.

Coals (Friday).—Carr's Hartley, 18s 6d, landing; Hartley, 18s; Hollywell Main, 17s 9d, Wear Hartley, 18s; Hilda, 18s 6d; Eden Main, 18s 6d; Tanfield, 18s 6d; Tees, 18s 6d; Hetton, 18s 6d per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—Notwithstanding that the supply of beasts here to-day was very moderate, the time of year commenced, the demand for all breeds, owing to the changes in the weather, was heavy, at a decline in the prices of Monday of 2d per 8 lbs. The highest figure for the best Scots was 3s 10d per 8 lbs. With sheep we have very scantily supplied. As the arrivals of dead meat up to Newgate and Leadenhall during the present week have been comparatively small, the mutton trade ruled extremely firm at full currency, and at times a good clearance was effected. The number of calves was limited, yet the veal trade was in a sluggish state. Prices underwent a curtailment of 2d per 8 lbs. With pigs we have scantily supplied. At the following currencies—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; large pork, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; inferior mutton, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; small pork, 3s 0d to 4s 0d.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

HON. CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, M.P. FOR WOLVERHAMPTON.*

The Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, barrister-at-law, Examiner of the Rolls in the Court of Chancery, is third son of the late Hon. George Villiers, by the only daughter of the first Lord Borringdon, and is thus brother of the Earl of Clarendon. He was born in 1802; took his degree at the University of Cambridge; and was called to the bar, at Lincoln's-inn, in 1827. In 1835 he was returned to Parliament (along with Thomas Thornley, Esq.) for the borough of Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire.

After the passing of the Reform Bill, the populous and busy district of which Wolverhampton is the centre set themselves to obtain practical results from the newly-acquired franchise. At the election of 1835, the question of Repeal of the Corn-Laws was put prominently forward, and Mr. Villiers and his colleague were chosen as Free Traders to represent the borough. Unfortunately the great mass of constituencies made no such practical use of their powers. Rich harvests had filled the country with abundance. Trade, in all its branches, was prospering, and it needed the reverses of 1836, and the keen distress commencing in 1837, to call general attention to the fact that we had laws in existence limiting our supplies of food, narrowing the bounds of our commercial intercourse, and placing us at disadvantage in the markets of the world. Mr. Villiers, in concert with Col. Thompson and Dr. Bowring, was one of the first who laboured to popularise these lessons, and to direct public opinion against the injustice and oppression of the bread-tax. On the 13th of December, 1838, the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, after a long and animated debate, resolved to petition Parliament for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-Laws. The decision was followed up not only by petitions; it was the signal for active agitation throughout the country. In January, 1839, a meeting of deputies from all parts of the kingdom was held in Manchester, to consider the best means of obtaining the repeal of the Corn-laws. On the assembling of Parliament in the same year, the delegates met at Brown's Hotel, Palace-yard, Westminster, and at that meeting Mr. Villiers was unanimously chosen leader of the Anti-Corn-law cause in the House of Commons. It needed no common courage to undertake the leadership. There were but few Free-Traders in the House. The Ministry and the expectants of office were alike opposed to Mr. Villiers. Whatever party there might be for some change in the Corn-Laws, there was, in reality, no party for the total and immediate repeal. Free-Traders on principle—those who would admit no compromise were few, either in the House or out of doors: public opinion and a Parliamentary party had both to be made.

Mr. Villiers had two courses open to him. Would he support the then Whig Government, there lay before him the sure distinctions of office; he was a man of too high connexion, and too great power as a popular speaker, to be long passed over in Ministerial arrangements. Would he place himself in the front of the struggle for Free-Trade, he must disavow himself from party, must be prepared to face the fiercest opposition from both sides of the House, and to endure the sneers, and even hatred and scorn, of both great parties, not only in public, but in private society. The Corn-Laws were too valuable a consideration to be fought for in the House alone; the entire social influence of all high circles was sure to be stirred in their defence. Mr. Villiers must fight the battle of the industrious classes in the face of his own class. He was not to take the position of a manufacturer or merchant, contending for the rights of commerce, and with the entire of his own order to back him up; but, belonging to the privileged order, he was to lead the people against them. Unless gifted with natural energy and under the strongest conviction of right, no man would undertake such a position. Mr. Villiers had literally nothing to gain by success. The contest must in any case be long and laborious. It was not to be supposed that the interested classes would resign the Corn-Laws; and so powerful were those classes in 1839, that the conference could scarce point out in what way the popular opinion they had yet to form was to be brought to bear upon them with practical force enough to win the abolition of the Corn-Laws. And if, after years of effort, the object were attained, Mr. Villiers had no better position to look to than was earlier within his reach, if he would take his stand with the resisters or compromisers of the popular demand. Mr. Villiers, however, took no note of his own interest or the difficulties in his way. He was a political economist not only by study, but by a natural aptness amounting almost to instinct. There was no hesitation on his part: he accepted the position of leader in a cause that many wise, experienced heads, even amongst those who wished it well, deemed hopeless. And after the Easter recess, in 1839, he brought forward his first Anti-Corn-law motion. That first motion would immediately resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the act regulating the importation of foreign corn." The motion was received pretty much as if it were a proposal for the re-distribution of property or the abolition of the House of Commons. Distress was spreading fast throughout the country—trade and manufactures were at a stand—there was hunger amongst the poor-rates, and disease, and crime were on the increase; still the House of Commons would not even discuss the question of the Corn-Laws with patience. The division was shouted for amidst hootings, cruwings, and uproar; and the vetoes, 381 to 90, sent the Anti-Corn-Law Bill to going into committee. Of those who voted with Mr. Villiers, not twenty, if even half that number, were in favour of the entire abolition of the Corn-Laws. The very idea was laughed at; and in all confidence Mr. Villiers and his friends were counselled to give up their insane attempt, as a time would come when an English Parliament should repeal the Corn-Laws. "Repeal the Corn-Law?" (said a Minister of the Crown, in reply to a deputation) "as soon abolish the Monarchy!" But Mr. Villiers, nothing daunted, resolved, year after year, to renew his motion, and the agitation went on both in and out of Parliament.

At the instance of Mr. Villiers, it was agreed that Mr. Hume should move for a committee to enquire into the effect of our system of import duties upon commerce and manufactures; and the report of that committee, published in 1840, supplied the Free-Trade party with such an accumulation of facts as placed their case upon unanswerable grounds. In the same year Mr. Villiers renewed his motion, and was again defeated by a large majority 300 voting against, and but 177 for, the committee. But his arguments, backed by the people out of doors, had told; and in the pressure of distress was so severe that the Government felt it impossible much longer to resist the demand for repeal. In the fourth amendment of the perfect law of 1815. At every stage Mr. Villiers met the measure with his amendment for total and immediate repeal. Up to this period, Mr. Villiers had borne the brunt of the battle alone. His bold able colleagues in the House, but all the hatred of opposition was directed against himself. He was a black sheep amongst his order. In 1841, Mr. Cobden (defeated in 1837) was returned for Stockport, and took his seat in 1842; and was followed, in 1843, by Mr. Bright. The aspect of affairs was changed—the heat of the fight was over. There was a hearing for the Free-Traders in the House. That much respect, Mr. Villiers had accomplished for his cause. The Parliament of the ten years' registry, the Ministry chosen to resist all compromise upon the Corn-Laws began to answer their opponents feebly, and with apologies and admissions, and to tremble under the responsibility of maintaining a bread-tax in the face of famine. The potato-rot completed their conviction. The continuance of the Corn-Law became impossible. It had had its day of three-and-thirty years.

Mr. Villiers met Sir Robert Peel's proposal of a gradual repeal, to take effect in three years, with his annual motion of total and immediate abolition, thus upholding to the last the principle upon which he had undertaken the Parliamentary leadership. But it would be injustice to Mr. Villiers, were we to allow it to be thought that he laboured only in Parliament: so far as the duties of his office, which required a pretty close attendance, would admit, he took his place among the agitators out of doors. He spoke on several occasions at meetings in Manchester and elsewhere throughout the country; was a frequent, and always, from his facts, and close and logical reasoning, a powerful and effective speaker at the great meetings in Covent-Garden and Drury-Lane. No public man ever stood more honestly by a cause, or worked more persevering for its advancement, than did Mr. Villiers by the question of Free-Trade.

In July, 1846, Mr. Villiers was invited by requisition, signed by a majority of the electors, to the representation of South Lancashire. The requisition is the only testimonial—and it is a most honourable one—which the country has as yet awarded to the long and able services of Mr. Villiers. It says, "We make the tender of our support to you, Charles Pelham Villiers, as a testimony of our gratitude and admiration of your persevering advocacy of the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-Laws, in the House of Commons, continued from year to year in the face of obstacles arising from the prejudices of some, and the indifference, almost equally culpable, of others, until your efforts, joining with those of your coadjutors out of doors, raised up throughout the kingdom a spirit and determination which will not subside until they have marked this period, to all future time, as the era of commercial reformation." Mr. Villiers was, in the same year, elected for South Lancashire without opposition; but, on the assembling of Parliament, he made his election to sit for Wolverhampton, the borough which had first sent him to Parliament as a Free-Trader, and now again elected him, in acknowledgment of the long and faithful fulfilment of his trust.

As the mover of the Address to the Throne, at the opening of Parliament, on Thursday, with Protection endeavouring to regain its ground, Mr. Villiers occupied his rightful position. It justly belonged to him to point out the results and defend the policy of Free-Trade.

* See Portrait at page 89.

Private Business of the House of Commons for the Session 1850.—There appears to be an increase of about a fifth on the business of the last session, 174 petitions for bills having been deposited at the Private Bill Office. Of these, 65 are promoted by railway companies, being chiefly for additional powers to enter into leases, to make deviations, or to abandon portions of lines; 32 are for powers to effect improvements in the lighting or cleansing of towns, 20 are for providing better supplies of water, 13 are for improvements in harbours and inland navigation, 19 relate to turnpike trusts, 5 relate to land and drainage in Ireland, and the remainder are for the incorporation of companies and other objects of a miscellaneous character. The present system of inquiry into compliances with the standing orders of the House continues to work remarkably well; and there being now uniform precedents on most standing-order questions, parties reserve their opposition generally for the decision of the committees on the merits, to the great saving of the public time and their own money.

"BOBBING THE BEER."

"BOBBING THE BEER."

The adulteration of Beer, technically termed "Bobbing," is, unfortunately for the public health, a practice much resorted to by the sellers of London Porter. It is principally carried on in "cheap neighbourhoods;" and may be considered as one of the evils of the Malt-Tax, as it would be scarcely worth while for the beer-seller to resort to adulteration if malt were free of duty.

It is stated to be a common practice for a certain class of publicans to make two or three casks of inferior beer from one genuine cask as received from the brewer. Among the ingredients of adulteration are salt and water; and the accompanying illustration is sketched at the moment when a block of salt is being thrown into the butt; whilst the assistant is mixing a compound called "Black Jack," to which in sometimes added treacle, also to be thrown into the tub.

It is not, however, to be supposed that this practice is resorted to by all sellers of the national drink; and we hope that this exposure may be the means of lessening such adulteration, by cautioning our readers as to the flavour of the spurious compound, and the price at which it is sold. The appearance of the adulterated Beer is quite equal to that of the genuine; but this factitious recommendation is obtained by other means than those we have described: fine heading, for instance, is the joint result of a copperas admixture, and the effect of drawing the beer through an engine.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

John P., Liverpool—Your attempted solutions of Problem No 313 are egregious failures. The position cannot be solved at all under the stipulated number of moves; if it could, it would be worthless. You are equally at fault with regard to the Enigmas.

Leicester-square Soup Kitchen.—The following is an extract from the statistics, report of the kitchen for the month ending Jan. 26, 1850, presented to the chairman and committee:—"Relieved with good soup and bread:—In the Kitchen—Men, 2876; women, 397. At their own homes—Men, women, and children, 30,484. Total, 33,557 It is painful to notice, that, by the above statistical account, the destitution from the inclement weather and want of employ has increased, the number of applicants for relief from 11,276 to 33,557 since my last report, making a total of 22,281 more than that of the preceding month. This clearly demonstrates that institutions such as your own are invaluable, even as remedial means, in the absence of a more comprehensive system for the support of the destitute poor—a thing such as making a provision for their employment in some remunerative occupation, whereby they may be enabled to support themselves and families. And here I take leave to suggest the opening of a registry in every workhouse or union, wherein the names of parties seeking employment, and others requiring servants, labourers, or artisans, might be entered, as is done on a small scale in your own institution. This system has been fraught with the most beneficial results. Many object to any general or extensive efforts to ameliorate the great body of the people, from the little probability of their applying themselves to any creditable pursuit were the same even provided for them. But the trial has never been fairly made. Objects calculated to arouse and interest them have never been duly presented to their view and attention; and it is not till the physical wants of man are in part satisfied that he finds time or opportunity for consideration of his real or permanent interests. The calamity of the poor is not alone their poverty—the tendency of their privations is to degrade their minds, and sink them in the social scale."

THE GREEK DIFFICULTY.

Her Majesty's Speech at the opening of the Session was particularly emphatic upon the peaceable state of our relations with foreign Powers. The Speech, however, had scarcely been uttered, when intelligence was received from the Mediterranean, to the effect that we were actually at war with one of the minor powers of Europe. The intelligence turns out to be correct; and Great Britain, one of the three states that guaranteed the independence, and constituted themselves the protectors of Greece, has suddenly broken off her relations with the Greek Government. Her Ambassador has withdrawn from Athens; her Admiral has declared the Grecian coast in a state of blockade; and we, a great power, are virtually at war with this little one, without having consulted, it would appear, our co-protectors of France and Russia, or taken any step to justify our conduct either to them or to Europe. The intelligence is startling enough, when thus nakedly stated. It becomes still more so, upon investigation of the circumstances that have placed us in this unhappy position.

Some time ago, as we learn from the statement made to the House of Commons by Lord Palmerston when questioned upon Monday evening, a Mr. Finlay, a British subject long established in Greece, was in possession of a piece of land in the vicinity of the palace of King Otho. That land was forcibly and illegally seized, and converted into gardens for the King's palace, without the slightest compensation or offer of compensation having been made to its lawful owner. This was the first cause of quarrel, and occurred apparently about four years ago. There was also, it appears, another British subject in the city of Athens, a Jew of Gibraltar, named Pacifico, whose house was attacked and plundered in mid-day by a mob, partly composed of Greek soldiers, and incited to the offence by the son of the Greek Minister at War. Mr. Pacifico demanded and was denied compensation. This was the second cause of quarrel; but we are not precisely informed of the date of its occurrence, although one account states it to have taken place no less than twenty-four years ago! Lord Palmerston further alleged, without condescending to enter minutely into the particulars, "that there were other cases of injustice towards subjects of the Ionian Islands, who had claims of indemnity either for plunder or bodily ill-usage;" but the principal bone of contention between the great British wolf and the little Grecian lamb is as to the sovereignty of the two small islands of Cervi and Sapienza. According to the views of King Otho and his advisers, these islands are part of Greece; according to the views of the British Government, they form part of the Ionian Republic. Lord Palmerston relies upon three treaties to support the right of the Ionian Republic, and of Great Britain as its protector: the original treaty of 1800 between us and Russia, by which, with the consent of the Sultan, the Ionian state was constituted and declared to consist of certain islands, the two in dispute being of the number; the treaty of Vienna, in 1815, which confirmed the treaty of 1800; and the treaty of 1832, by which the kingdom of Greece was itself constituted, and which expressly declared the limits both of Greece and the Ionian Republic. All of these claims appear to be of somewhat ancient date—the latter more especially—and to have formed subjects of friendly negotiation from time to time between the two Governments. It does, therefore, seem rather surprising that, all at once—as if we had suddenly lost patience and the power of self-control—our Minister at the Court of Athens should insist upon a settlement within so short a period as twenty-four hours. It is unprecedentedly sharp practice, to use the mildest expression to designate it; but, sharp as it was, it was the course actually adopted. The British Admiral, after dining with King Otho in a friendly manner on one day, proceeded on the morrow to blockade his ports, and declare him an enemy of Great Britain. The country is willing to believe that later dispatches, of which the Government is in daily anticipation, and which will and must be laid before Parliament, will throw a further light upon the subject, and rob it of its present rather ugly character. In the meantime, the circumstances are not of a nature to impress the public mind in favour of the conduct of the parties who are responsible to the people of England for what has been done, nor to allay the jealous feelings with which the other Powers of Europe are but too prone to regard all our proceedings in the Mediterranean.

It has been alleged that the Government of Greece is an unworthy Government; that these degenerate Greeks are utterly undeserving of the enthusiasm once manifested in their cause by the great nations of western Europe; that they do not understand public or private liberty; and that they exist in a state of semi-barbarism, and I break faith with this and all other countries towards whom they have contracted engagements. These allegations are for the most part but too well founded; and to be as perfidious as a Greek, has become a common term of reproach in Europe. But conceding all these things, and supposing moreover that the British Government has justice on its side in all the demands it has made upon King Otho and his ministers, it does not seem altogether consistent, either with our dignity or with common discretion, to act the part of a blustering bully, and proceed to extremities against a weak State, when we would not have resorted to them against a Power able to cope with us. Greek duplicity is no excuse for British blustering. Nor is this the only part of the case that looks ill upon investigation. We may, strictly speaking, be justified by the law and practice of nations in enforcing payment of compensation due to British subjects for injuries and outrages inflicted upon them; but we are not justified, as the Earl of Aberdeen and Lord Brougham remarked, in coercing the Greek Government into a cession of territory without the consent of the other Powers who, equally with ourselves, are the sworn guarantees of the Greek State. The cases of Mr. Finlay and the Gibraltar Jew are matters in which neither the French nor the Russian Government is concerned; they are entirely between us and the Greek Government: and though France and Russia might in such case act the part of friendly advisers, and counsel moderation, they would have no right to consider themselves aggrieved if we thanked them for their advice, and declined taking it. They might, as friends of Greece and of Great Britain, deplore that differences should have arisen which admitted of no other than a forcible settlement, but there, their functions would stop. But, in a question relating to the extent of the Grecian territory, and to the possession of these two islands of Cervi and Sapienza—unimportant and valueless as they may be—or, in fact, to a single inch of the Greek dominions—we have clearly no right to proceed to extremities in the enforcement of our claim, without consulting the two Powers who, with ourselves, form the Greek Protectorate. It is not simply our business—it is theirs also. Any assumption on our part, of authority to treat it without their concurrence and consent, is impolitic and unwarrantable, to say the least of it, and may in its consequence be fatal to the continuance of a good understanding between us. Powerful as we are, we cannot afford such a quarrel as this; and it is earnestly to be desired, that we may get out of it as soon as possible, and with the least possible loss of dignity. We have quite enough upon our hands at home and in our colonies, without embroiling ourselves with any Power in Europe; and the sooner we solve this Grecian difficulty, by accepting the friendly mediation of our allies, the better for all parties. We have not as yet gone too far to withdraw honourably.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The month of February seems destined to be fatal to the peace of Paris; and, accordingly, no wonder does it begin than insurrectionary tumult displays itself. During the past week there have been many attacks that have taken place in the capital; the ostensible cause of which was the removal of some of the decayed trees of liberty which disfigured the Boulevards; the original intention of the authorities being not to let the trees which had taken root and germinated. The first collision took place on Wednesday evening, when a party of the populace descended on Madelaine, in the hope of the crowd assembled there by the permission to cut down the tree of liberty in the Rue St. Martin. Tumultuous assemblages began to be grouped around them as long experience had taught the people of Paris, and the police were speedily compelled to seek for safety in flight. The troops then arrived, and a desperate conflict ensued, in the course of which a gentleman accidentally passing by was killed by a musket-shot, and a number of persons severely wounded, on both sides.

General de Lamoricière, who was passing at the time, had a narrow escape. He was on his way in a hack cab to the Rue Rochelien, when, hearing of some disturbances, he directed the coachman to go by the Rue St. Martin. On reaching the Porte St. Denis he was attacked and his carriage pelted with stones in a manner quite impossible, so he determined to go back; but he was too late—the crowd had gathered behind the carriage, and the General being recognised, a man, putting his head in, called upon him to cry "Vive la République!" The General, on this, drew his sword, and with the flat of the blade struck a man who had cried out in the same manner on the head; but a second and third impression of the same kind were made on the back of the head from a man who cried out "Vive la République!" Other Lancers then coming up, the crowd was driven in every direction, and the General reached the Boulevard, he was met by an old fellow-officer, who gave him shelter in his house; not, however, before about the hundredth repetition of the cry of his hat. The crowd remained at the door, and the General was obliged to make his escape by breaking through a wall, entering another house, from whence he escaped home.

In the course of the evening, thirty-two individuals were arrested at the place of meeting of the "Association des Marchands de Vin," Rue Jean Robert; and twenty-three others, a branch establishment in the Rue de Poitou. About 200 arrests were made altogether. The majority of them are said to be paddoned insurgents from Belle Isle. On the tree of liberty at the Porte St. Martin, the inscription of "Vive la République Nouvelle" had been placed.

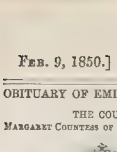
The following day, Thursday, was a holiday, a small band of [illegible] was paraded round the [illegible] with the cry of "Vive la République!" and the Code Pénal. The mob formed a circle about the tree, dancing, and singing the Marseillaise; and lanterns and torches gleamed in every direction.—(See the Illustration at page 96.)

During the night, by order of the Prefect of Police, troops of sergents de ville, in civil dress, were dispersed [illegible]. Large numbers were [illegible] and cut down the trees of liberty, [illegible] causing general [illegible] the rebelles, at the corners of streets, to keep watch and ward, in case of attack, to convey away the [illegible] of the [illegible] (See next page.)

On Tuesday the Moniteur published a proclamation, stating that the only reason why some of the trees of liberty had been cut down was that they impeded the [illegible] traffic, and those now remaining would be respected, except they should give rise to discontent and tumult, when the Government would instantly order their removal. This, however, did not satisfy the people, who began to assemble in crowds in the Quartier St. Martin. At noon numerous groups of men in blouses filled the streets about the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers and the Boulevards. The sergens de ville had some difficulty in keeping upon path through the streets, and General Changarnier went out on horseback with an escort of dragoons to reconnoitre the state of affairs, and carried them rist. Between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, the crowd became so thick and compact about the Porte St. Martin, that troops had to be ordered out to keep the streets clear; but up to five o'clock, no conspicuous [illegible] had occurred. [illegible] hour, however, the crowd assembled [illegible] number, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE COUNTESS OF WEMYSS AND MARCH.



MARGARET COUNTESS OF WEMYSS, wife of Francis, present Earl, died at Gosford House (his Lordship's seat), near Haddington, on the 25th ult. Her Ladyship was fourth daughter of the late Walter Campbell, Esq., of Shawfield, sister of Ladies Rathven and Belhaven, and aunt of the late Countesses of Uxbridge and Charleville. Her marriage with Lord Wemyss (then Lord Elcho) took place in 1794, and its issue consists of one surviving son, Francis Lord Elcho, and four surviving daughters.—Lady Charlotte Fletcher of Saltoun, Lady Harriet Sastie, Lady Jane and Lady Caroline, both unmarried. There were one other son, Walter, and five daughters, who are deceased. Of the latter, the eldest, Lady Eleanor, married her cousin, Walter Frederick Campbell, Esq., of Shawfield and Islay; Lady Margaret was the wife of Lieut.-Col. John Widman; Lady Augusta married Lord Grey, of Groby; and Lady Louisa-Antoinetta, William Forbes, Esq., M.P., of Callendar.

SIR RIGGS FALKINER, BART.

THE death of this Baronet occurred on the 25th ult., in Regent-street, London. He was the eldest son of the late Sir Samuel Falkiner, Bart., of Ann Mount, co. Cork, by Sarah his wife, daughter of Charles Lesin, M.D.; and grandson of Sir Riggs Falkiner, on whom the title was conferred in 1777. At the period of his decease he had attained his eighty-first year. Leaving no issue, he is succeeded by his brother, now Sir Charles Leslie Falkiner, fourth Baronet.

SIR FELIX BOOTH.

SIR FELIX BOOTH, Bart., of Portland-place, in the county of Middlesex, and Great Catworth, in the county of Huntingdon, was the third son of Philip Booth, Esq., of London, and was himself well known as an eminent and wealthy distiller. He served the office of Sheriff of London in 1838-39, and was, in 1834, by William IV., who had personally known him for years, created a Baronet, with remainder, default his own male issue, to the heirs male of his elder brother, William Booth, Esq., of Rayden Hall, Yorkshire.

Sir Felix Booth was a person distinguished for his peculiar activity and ability in matters of business. Besides his great malt distillery and dyeing establishment, he was engaged in a variety of successful enterprises. He took a prominent part in the foundation of the prosperous London Joint Stock Bank, and the establishment of the Brentford Gas-Works. About the time of his shrivalty he munificently provided out of his own private fortune for the amounting to nearly £20,000 for Sir John Ross's expedition to the North Pole. Nor did his generosity stop here. During the many anxious months when the expedition could not be heard of, and fears were entertained of its loss, Sir Felix Booth supplied a weekly allowance (unknown to them from whom it came) to the wives of the sailors absent with Ross. In grateful recollection of his munificent patron, Sir John Ross named the northern termination of the American continent, Boothia Felix.

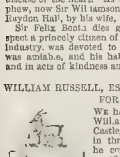
Sir Felix Booth died suddenly at the York Hotel, Brighton, on the 25th ult., of disease of the heart. As Sir Felix was unmarried, the title devolves on his nephew, now Sir William Booth Bart., the eldest son of the late Mr. Booth, of Rayden Hall, by his wife, Mary, daughter and co-heir of John Williamson, Esq.

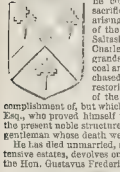
Sir Felix Booth dies generally and justly lamented. He was in every respect a princely citizen of London: his immense wealth, acquired by his own industry, was devoted to the benefit or enjoyment of others. His disposition was amiable, and his habits were splendid: he took delight in hospitality, and in acts of kindness and charity.

WILLIAM RUSSELL, ESQ., OF BRANCEPETH CASTLE, FORMERLY M.P. FOR THE COUNTY OF DURHAM.



WE have to announce the death, on the 30th January, of William Russell, Esq., at his splendid seat of Brancepeth Castle, county Durham. He was M.P. for that entire county in three Parliaments, prior to the Reform Act, for which he constantly voted, making thereby a larger individual sacrifice of borough interest, and political power thenceforward, than any other commoner. He was the only son of the late Matthew Russell, Esq., of Brancepeth, M.P. for Saltash, by Elizabeth his wife, sister of the Right Hon. Charles Tennyson D'Eyncourt, M.P., of Bayons Manor, and grandson of William Russell, Esq., one of the most successful and landed proprietors in England. He it was who purchased Brancepeth, and formed the magnificent project of restoring to its pristine splendour that long-neglected Castle of the Nevilles—a task which his age denied him strength to accomplishment of, but which he bequeathed to his son, the late Matthew Russell, Esq., who proved himself well worthy of the trust, and under his auspices arose the present noble structure, inferior to few others in the north of England. The gentleman whose death we are recording, succeeded to the estates in 1822.

He has died unmarried, and his magnificent Castle of Brancepeth, with his extensive estates, devolves on his only sister, Ann, Countess of Plymouth, and on her husband the Hon. Gustavus Frederick Hamilton, eldest son of Viscount Boyne; of which marriage there is issue one son, Gustavus Russell Hamilton, now an infant.

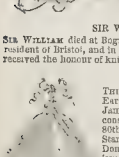


THE DOWAGER COUNTESS OF PLYMOUTH.

ANN, Countess Dowager of Plymouth, who died at her house, in Park-street, on the 30th ult., in her 76th year, was daughter of Thomas Copson, Esq., and widow of Henry, eighth and last Earl of Plymouth, to whom she was married 12th July, 1798, and by whom she had no issue.

SIR WILLIAM JOHN STRUTH, KNT.

SIR WILLIAM died at Bognor on the 1st instant, aged 87. He was formerly a resident of Bristol, and in 1815 filled the office of Mayor, on which occasion he received the honour of knighthood.



LADY ANNE HARRIET CHICHESTER.

THIS venerable lady, the third daughter of John, seventh Earl of Galloway, by Anne his wife, daughter of Sir James Dashwood, Bart., was born on the 3rd of March, 1781. He was the son of William Mather, the composer of a beautiful set of psalm and hymn tunes, now almost universally used in the churches in England. He was first taught the organ and pianoforte by his father, and under him was assistant organist of St. Paul's Church, in Sheffield. He played Bishop organ in Barnsley Church, when he sat on his father's knees, to enable him to reach the [illegible]. After establishing his reputation as an organist in many provincial places, and at Handel's Commemoration, in Westminster Abbey, Mr. Mather was, in 1814, appointed organist of Bishop Sandford's Chapel, in Ross-street, Edinburgh, and removed with Bishop Sandford to St. John's Chapel. It was while residing in Hal-gate, Doncaster, in 1809 that the Yorkshire Amateur Triennial Meeting was first established at his house. Among the projectors were himself, Mr. White, of Leeds; Dr. Camidge, of York; Mr. Mando, of Wakefield, and a few others. He conducted the festivals in Edinburgh until Sir H. Bishop was appointed Professor of Music at the University, and then he was appointed chorus master. He professed with, we believe, George Thompson, Esq., George Hogarth, Esq., and others, the institution for sacred music in Edinburgh, of which for some time he was the sole instructor. Mr. Mather died at Edinburgh on the 20th ult., in his 69th year

POSTAGE UNDER TREATIES WITH BELGIUM.—A Treasury warrant, which appears in Tuesday's Gazette, settles the following rates of postage for the conveyance of letters to Belgium direct or viâ France:—On every letter not exceeding half an ounce in weight, a uniform rate of 1 rish postage of 4d.; on every letter exceeding half an ounce in weight, and not exceeding one ounce in weight, two rates of postage; on every letter exceeding one ounce, and not exceeding two ounces in weight, four rates of postage; on every letter exceeding two ounces, and not exceeding three ounces in weight, six rates of postage; on every letter exceeding three ounces, and not exceeding four ounces in weight, eight rates of postage; and for every ounce in weight above the weight of four ounces, two additional rates of postage.

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR FEBRUARY.

DAVID COPPERFIELD AND HIS LAUNDRESS

What I underwent from Mrs. Crupp, in consequence of the tyranny she established over me, was dreadful. I never was so much afraid of any one. We made a compromise of everything. If I hesitated, she was taken with that wonder, a disorder which was always lying in ambush in her system, ready, at the shortest notice, to prey upon her vitals. If I rang the bell impatiently, after half a dozen unavailing modest pulls, and she appeared at last—which was not by any means to be relied upon—she would appear with a resentful aspect, sink breathless on a chair near the door, lay her hand upon her nankeen bosom, and become so ill, that I was glad, at any sacrifice of brandy or anything else, to get rid of her. If I objected to having my bed made at five o'clock in the afternoon—which I do still think an uncomfortable arrangement—the motion of her hand towards the same nankeen region of wounded sensibility was enough to make me falter an apology. In short, I would have done anything in an honourable way rather than give Mrs. Crupp offence; and she was the terror of my life.—David Copperfield.

THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE.

Reader, if you are not entirely "used up," and can still relish an interesting moment, take a stroll with us into the General Post-Office on a morning, just as the clock is upon the stroke of six. The scene is much more exciting than half the émeutes which have lately taken place on the Continent; considerably cleaner, and much more safe. Stand aside and let the male bevy of sorters arrive on the right hand, and watch the general attack upon the letter-takers. A stream of four or five hundred people, who run as Doyle's pencil in Punch only can make them run, dash desperately towards the open windows of the receivers. Against this torrent a couple of hundred who have posted, dodge and finally disappear. Wave after wave of people advances and retreats, gorging with billets the capacious swallow of the post. Meanwhile a still more active and vigorous attack is going on in the direction where newspapers are received. A sashless window-frame, with tremendous gaps, is assailed with showers of papers, which fly faster than the driven snow. Now and then large sacks fall, direct from the different news-van lots and publishing offices, to be handled in and bolted whole. As the moments pass the flight of papers grow thicker; those who cannot struggle "to the fore" whiz their missiles of intelligence over the heads of the others, now and then sweeping back with the force of round shot. Letters struggle with more desperate energy, which is increased to frantic desperation as the clock slowly strikes, one—two—three—four—five—six; when, with a crash, a pile of guillotining a score of hands, with one long final swish, all the windows shiver simultaneously descend. The post like a huge monster has received its full supply for the night, and gorged, basks, imperceptibly to the spectators, in quiet to digest. The number of newspapers posted in London principally by the trade is perfectly enormous. Several vans full of the Times, for instance, are despatched by every morning and evening mail; other morning papers contribute their sacks full of broadsheets; and on Saturday evening not a paper of any circulation in the metropolis but contributes more or less largely to swell that enormous accumulation of packets which descend upon the Post-office. As they are carried to the different tables to be sorted, great baskets with fresh supplies are wound up by the endless chain which passes from top to bottom of the building. The numbers of papers passing through all the post-offices in the kingdom is not less than 70,000,000 per annum, or only 10,000,000 less than the annual number of stamps issued to newspapers by Great Britain. Of late years the broadsheet has materially increased in size and weight, each paper now averaging five ounces; so that 9765 tons weight of papers annually, or 187 tons weekly, are posted, full half of which pass through St. Martin's-le-Grand, and thence to the uttermost ends of the earth to India, China, or Australia, absolutely free! The penny news stamp alone carries them, whilst, if they were charged by the letter scale, sixpence would be the postage: so that if weight were considered in the accounts of the Post-office, there would be a loss in their carriage of ninepence on every newspaper, or of no less a sum than £2,625,000 annually on the whole number carried. Fraser's Magazine.

A PRODIGIOUS BOY.

As Lady Agnes never denied her son anything, and fell into all his ways with the fondest acquiescence, she was rewarded by a perfect confidence on young Harry's part, who never thought to disguise from her a knowledge of the haunts which he frequented; and, as to carrying home any thing he pleased, from apples from the clubs and billiard-rooms, which the simple lady relished, if she did not understand, "My son goes to Spratt's," she would say to her confidential friends. "All the young men go to Spratt's after the play, and Harry is naturally interested in size and weight, each paper now averaging five ounces; so that 9765 tons weight of papers annually, or 187 tons weekly, are posted, full half of which pass through St. Martin's-le-Grand, and thence to the uttermost ends of the earth to India, China, or Australia, absolutely free! "All the young men go to Spratt's after the play, and Harry is naturally interested in my dear; and they play billiards as they used to play macao and hazard in Mr. Fox's time. Yes, my dear rather often told me that they sate up always until nine o'clock the next morning, with Mr. Fox at Brooks's, and Lord Carnarvon at Drummington, when I was a little girl, in a buff wal-teast and black satin smallclothes. My brother Erith never played as a young man, nor sate up late—he had no health for it; but my young man is as every inch a Carnarvon. Yes, and then he often goes to a place called the Back Kitchen, frequented by all the wits and authors, you know, whom one does not see in society, but whom it is a great pleasure and pleasantry to meet at supper, and to hear the conversations of the day discussed; and my dear father often said that it was our duty to encourage literature, and he had hoped to see the late Dr. Johnson at Drummington, only Dr. Johnson died. Yes, and Mr. Sheridan came over, and drank a great deal of wine—everybody drank a great deal of it—and Mr. Fox said, papa's wine-merchant's bill was ten times as much as Erith's is, who gets it as he wants it from Fortnum and Mason's, and doesn't keep any stock at all." "That was an uncommon good dinner we had yesterday, at the artful Harry broke out. "Their clear soup's better than ours. Mouffiet will put too much tarragon into everything. The suprême de volaille was very good—uncommon; and the sweets were better than Mouffiet's sweets. God save the plombière, ma'am, and the maraschino jelly!" Stunningly good that maraschino jelly!" Lady Agnes expressed her agreement in these, as in almost all, other sentiments of her son, who continued the artful conversation.—Pendennis.

SPITALFIELDS SILK MANUFACTURE

Spitalfields is, however, not yet fairly ruined; but it may be questioned if its products at the present time are not equal, may superior, to those of its best day; under the state of things, the trade does, as a whole, but a small and very extensive character, and its products are thus placed side by side with those of the foreigner, and frequently labelled as "rich Lyons," or the "newest Parisian style." Used for so long a period to depend upon others rather than upon themselves, for many years the expedient devised by the Spitalfields' men to keep up their trade was in constantly copying the designs of the French. Thus it happened that two or three manufacturers would frequently bring out the same pattern at the same time, to the serious loss of each, inasmuch as the particular pattern being duplicated or triplicated, the market was overstocked, and a fall in price was the result. Originality was, and still is, too expensive, except in solitary cases; but it will be found ultimately that the secret of success in Spitalfields, as in France, lies in a constant change of pattern, and this can only be attained by a distinct attention to the question of design. The leading men of Spitalfields see this pretty now, though they do not act upon it to the extent which they might.—Journal of Design.

PIRATES OF THE INDIAN ARCHIPELAGO.

There is a philosophy in trade as well as in all other things, and none can comprehend this who does not perceive the infinite extension that civilization would enjoy were the piratical hordes of the Indian Archipelago restrained from their depredations. This is a commercial country, and will not be deluded by the artifices of a whimpering humanitarianism, or the flimsy sophistry of a false economy. It knows the value of our commerce in the Indian Archipelago—it has been shown how great may be its future development, and it is aware how severe are the restrictions imposed upon it by the depredations of a formidable piratical system. The policy, therefore, which would commence from this great enemy, as long as it is characterised by humanity and justice, must be supported by all who have at heart the interests of their own country, and the welfare of the Indian Archipelago. That fertile region is not as a mine whose quick exhaustion floods the owner's coffers with a sudden tide of wealth; but as a vast neglected estate, whose productiveness will be in proportion to the care expended on its cultivation.—Tait's Magazine.

CONTENTS OF A SKULL.

I may claim the merit of having originated the suggestion that the will should be looked for in the box. After some search, it was found in the box, at the bottom of a nurse's workbag; wherein (besides hay) there was discovered an old gold watch, with chain and seals, which Mr. Barkis had worn on his wedding-day, and which had never been seen before or since; a silver tobacco-stopper, in the form of a leg; an imitation lemon, full of minute cups and saucers, which I have some idea Mr. Barkis must have purchased in the course of his visit to "Mr. Blackboy," and was "to be left with Barkis till called for;" a table which had elaborately written on the lid, in characters now scarcely legible. He had hoarded all these years, I found, to good purpose. His property in money amounted to nearly two thousand pounds. David Copperfield.

THE NEEDLEWOMEN

Many things have been written about shirt-making; but here, perhaps, is the saddest thing of all, not written any where till now, that I know of. Shirts by the fifty thousand are made at twopence-ha'-penny each, and found. Meanwhile, no needlewomen, distressed or other, can be procured in London by any houses life to give, for fair wages, fair help in sewing. Ask any thrifty housemother, high or low, and she will answer: In high houses, and in low, it is the same answer. No real needlewoman, "distressed" or other, has been found attainable in any of the houses frequent. Imaginary needlewomen, who demand considerable wages, and have a deadly appetite for beer and tea, I hear of everywhere; but their sewing proves too often a disappearing and botching not sewing, only the fallacious hope of it—a fond imagination of the mind. Good sempstresses are to be heard in every village; and in London, with its famishing thirty-thousand, not at all, or hardly. Is not Nogovernment beautiful in human business? To such length has the Leave-alone principle carried it, by way of organising labour, in this affair of shirtmaking. Let us hope the Leave-alone principle has now got its apotheosis, and taken, wing towards higher regions than ours, to dee. Benefices with a class of affairs more appropriate for it! Latter-Day Pamphlets, No. 1.

IRELAND.

A meeting of the friends and supporters of Mr. Reynolds, M.P., the Lord Mayor, was held on Monday, at his invitation, in the Mansion-house. The attendance was numerous, and the Lord Mayor, who presided in his robes of office, at the commencement of the proceedings, observed that though he had money enough for his private wants, he had not funds sufficient to defend himself against the systematic persecution to which he was subjected, and it was therefore for the people to say whether they would allow him to fight the battle single-handed. He then retired from the meeting, and another chairman having been appointed, a series of resolutions were adopted to the effect that the citizens were resolved to support and aid Mr. Reynolds against the efforts of his enemies, whose hostility they attributed to sectarianism and political enmity; that for that purpose a subscription list be opened to raise a fund, and ward meetings be held to promote the cause.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The rent for the week was but £7 10s. 8d., as announced at the meeting, on Monday, in Conciliation Hall.

MARRIAGES IN IRELAND.—The total number of marriages registered in Ireland (as shown by the report of the Registrar-General), in 1847, was 69[illegible], of which 4321 were according to the rites of the Established Church, and 2622 otherwise. Of the whole number, 6 were married by special license, 3697 by the banns, 329 by banns, and 66 by registrar's certificates. Of the Society of Friends, only 10 persons were married; and of the community of Jews, only 1. During the last nine months of 1847, 246 men, and 1210 women, were married who were under age. In the same period, 863 widowers, and 423 widows, were re-married. The decrease of marriages registered in 1847, as compared with 1846, was very great.

Mr. Mitchell, Solicitor-General for Ireland, was elected, without opposition, on Wednesday, M.P. for Windsor, in the room of Lord John Hay, retired.

On Friday night week, the mail-steamer Thetis, plying between Greenock and Belfast, ran into the brig Mathew Kay, by which both vessels were much damaged, and the mails delayed. The vessels were able to return to port, and no lives were lost.

BANQUET TO NEW ZEALAND CHIEFS, AT WELLINGTON.

WE have been favoured with the following very interesting report of the proceedings at an Entertainment lately given at Wellington, by Dr. Fitzgerald, to a party of Native Chiefs of New Zealand, on the occasion of having received from Earl Grey a portrait of her Majesty Queen Victoria, as a present to the Colonial Hospital.

The undermentioned Chiefs were present:—

Te Puni; Henare, of Pitone Pa; Matahiwi; To Kepa, of Waiwatu; E. Take; Manihera, of Ngaurunga; Te Watene; Henere Te Keha, Queen Charlotte's Sound; Taringa Kuri, Kawarawara; Moturoa, Poruiti; Ipaia, of Rangitikei; E. Hunia; Mohi; Te Retimona, of Te Aro; Hemi Kaporohehau, of The Huff; Kirikaramu, of Oharin; Watarouhe; Kamai Paroa, of Forina, Mohi; Hopata, of Wanui; Arawa haraka, of Wharerei; Toheroa, of Te Urubi, Tauranga; Hiwi Te Ahu, of Waikanae; Te Matia. Te Puke; Te Hamarahe, of Otaki; Te Ahu; Hakaraia; Tamihana; Matene; Watanui, of Otaki; Tarotoa, of Manawatu.

The following English gentlemen were present as guests: Archdeacon Hadfield; H. S. Hill, resident Magistrate; Dudley Thomas, Andtor-General; T. Fitzgerald, Chief Surveyor; A. E. McDonough, Inspector of Police; Dr. Monteith; H. [illegible] Native Secretary; J. D. Ormond, Acting Private Secretary; Robert [illegible], Esq., and William Vincent, Esq., editors of both the local papers; Walter Mantell, Esq.; J Dughton, Interpreter to the Courts; besides a great number of spectators.

Dr. Fitzgerald took the chair; H. St. Hill, Esq., acted as vice-chairman.

The room, which is spacious and commodious, was most tastefully decorated by Mr. Wilkinson with native evergreens and flowers. At the head of the apartment, over the chair, was the portrait of her Majesty; and over it a splendid crown of dahlias. Underneath were two splendid native war spears, forming, with the floor, a triangle, from the apex of which a pheasant's feather cloak was suspended; three greenstone clubs, also suspended; these, being emblems of New Zealand chieftainship, were intended to represent the cession of sovereignty to her Majesty the Queen. On each side of the picture were two mares (greenstone clubs) intended to represent their support of her Majesty's government. On either side of the portrait, also, but at some distance, were two illuminated stars, which had a most brilliant effect. The room was well lighted. The portrait was a proof impression from the celebrated mezzotint engraving of Cousins, after Hyner's painting, representing the Queen in her robes of state, and calculated, from the accessories introduced into the picture, to impress the natives with some idea of the pomp and circumstance attendant on Majesty.

At half-past six, the guests sat down to a very excellent dinner, which had been laid out in every respect as if for European guests only. The Chiefs were all clothed in their native costume, with the exception of two, who, instead of coats, wore very handsome "kaitaka" mats; they behaved with great decorum, observing the same courtesies of the dinner-table, including the custom of taking wine with their neighbours, as Europeans are accustomed to.

After dinner, Dr. Fitzgerald proposed the health of her Majesty the Queen, which was drunk with great enthusiasm, the natives joining in the honour with true English fashion. The health of his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Royal Family was also well responded to.

Dr. Fitzgerald, on rising to propose the health of the Right Hon. Earl Grey, Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, in whose honour this entertainment was given, addressed the native Chiefs as follows:—"My friends, in rising to propose to you the health of Earl Grey, this is my address to you. You are, perhaps, thinking within yourselves what is the object of this meeting of Chiefs? Hear ye all: The origin of this entertainment is my love to you all—to your people, to your families, and to your sick people. But I am wrong; I am not the only one who has a regard for you and your sick: there is another person whose regard for you is still greater—he lives in England—Earl Grey is his name. He is one of the Queen's confidential advisers; he has sent me this picture of our Queen Victoria (whose power is great in every part of the world), that it might be hung up in the Hospital as an ornament—as a mark of his regard to you, natives, and to your sick. When Earl Grey hears that you have given over the practice of abandoning your sick; that you have forsaken your bad customs; that you are living like white people in everything—in churches, in villages, in mills, in horses, in cows—his heart will rejoice; he will carry his joy to the Queen—the Queen will rejoice; England will rejoice saying, 'Now, indeed, is this people becoming like to the white people!' My friends, let us love one another, and let us not abandon this custom of meeting together. Having said this much, I will now propose to you the health of the Right Hon. Earl Grey, Secretary of State for this country." The toast was drunk with the enthusiasm by the chiefs, who repeated each time the noble Earl's name whilst admiring the portrait.

The Chairman then proposed the health of his Excellency Sir George Grey, Governor of New Zealand; stating that they could all bear testimony to the benefits conferred on them by his Excellency; that they had practical proofs of his deep regard and solicitude which he had for their welfare; and that his greatest desire was to see them happy and prosperous, living in love with their white brethren. The natives applauded these few words, and the toast was drunk with three times three.

The health of his Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor was then proposed, and well responded to.

The Chairman then proposed the following toast, which was drunk with great enthusiasm:—"The White Man and the Maori; that they may continue to live together peaceably—that they may have but one mind, and one desire, for the good of this country."

Te Puni rose and said: Listen to me; let us give our allegiance to the Queen; let us join with Lord Grey, with the Governor, with the white people. This is all I have to say.

Tamihana rose and said: This saying is good; let us truly join with the Queen, the Governor, and the white people. I have done.

Te Puke rose and said that this portrait had been the means of bringing them together—a circumstance which had not happened since the white man came to this country. It had brought two hostile tribes into social contact with each other, and he was anxious that they should live on friendly terms with the white people, and join together in their allegiance to the Queen of whom the portrait was a likeness.

Te Matia said that they were brought together from a great distance by this entertainment of Dr. Fitzgerald, and in a friendly manner; that this was the commencement of a new era—a new manner of living—a desire to live thenceforth together in their allegiance as one people to the Queen whose portrait was before them; that their regard for Governor Grey was great—that he was a tried friend; and that he (Te Matia) had brought the Queen.

Rauparaha rose and said, that, having met at this feast, he wished all former differences between him and the Ngatiawas to be set at rest, that they should all join as one people with the Queen, with the Governor, and with the white people.

Nohorua said a few words to the same effect, in which he was joined by Kapuraheua, who acknowledged his having fought against the white people during the late disturbances, but never again would he against them; he was now a firm friend.

Robert Harumaihi, of Wanui, cordially assented to all that had been said, but wished to express one still more important, not only of declaring their allegiance to the Queen, and their wish to obey and support the Governor, but also the necessity of submitting to and obeying all the laws and regulations of the two countries. Welington: true law and peace and the Resident Magistrate's Courts.

Matarua, Poroti, Hemi, Mobi, Matene, Toheroa, Henere, Te Kepa, Manitchera, [illegible] Te Watene, and many others, addressed the assembly to the same effect.

[illegible] rose and said, in a concluding speech, that, having made their profession of allegiance to the Queen's Government, in reference to the case murders he asked them if they were all prepared to give their concurrence to the sentence which had been passed upon the Maori prisoner, that he should be put to death; he now called upon them to make a public declaration; they gave their assent in the most emphatic manner, which was three times repeated.

BANQUET GIVEN AT WELLINGTON TO NATIVE CHIEFS OF NEW ZEALAND.

he then proposed the "Health of their Doctor (Fitzgerald), and success to the Colonial Hospital, the benefits of which they all knew."

The native secretary then proposed the "Health of the Rev. O. Hadfield," which was received and drunk with great delight by all present.

THE HUNGARIAN EXILES IN PHILADELPHIA.

The festal reception of the brave Hungarians in the port of New York, and the affection and sympathy shown towards them by the Americans during their stay in that city, are already known to our readers. The President of the United States lately sent an invitation to a large number of the refugees to the city of Washington, where, in the White House as well as in the Congressional Sessions, some eloquent speeches were made in sympathy for these unfortunate exiles. On their way to Washington, they passed through the city of Philadelphia, where Mdlle. Jagello, the heroine, with some six of her compatriots, arrived on Monday, the 7th of January. The officers of the German National Guards and a number of Hungarians awaited them on the wharf, from whence they were respectfully conducted to Washington House, in Chestnut-street. On Wednesday the Governor Ujhazy, with his lady and family, arrived likewise from New York. Immense crowds received them with great enthusiasm. The Governor and his family were quartered in Washington House.

After a few minutes' rest, all the Hungarians were conducted to the Walnut-street Theatre; and, though they did not understand a word of the performances, they seemed very pleased, and remained till the end. On their return from the theatre, a serenade was given them by the united choruses of the German population; when five "männerchors," with about 200 voices, sang several German national melodies, with very striking effect. Meanwhile the Governor, Mdlle. Jagello, and their compatriots appeared on the balcony of Washington House; and, at the close of the last song, Mr. Ujhazy, coming into the street, was received with cheers by the people; and he addressed the crowd in the German language. The venerable face of the old grey-bearded hero—ruddy by the bright glow of a hundred torches, carried by the serenaders—gave a romantic contrast with the deep shadow in the background. His speech was interrupted several times by the shouts of his auditors.

On behalf of the German population, Mr. Rosenthal replied to the Governor. Captain Binder, of the German Guards, then appeared by the side of Mdlle Jagello on the balcony, and, in the name of the heroine, spoke a few words of thanks to the serenaders.

In conclusion, Edward Remeney, one of the exiles, addressed a few words in English to the crowd, which were likewise responded to with loud cheers; and it was morning ere the serenaders and the crowd dispersed, and the exiles retired.

On Thursday, January the 10th, the distinguished guests visited the Hall of Independence, and were received by the Committee. Each of the Hungarians was shown the pictures and statues of Washington, Lafayette, and William Penn.

The party was introduced to Mayor Jones by A. D. Chaloner, M.D., on behalf of the military; when his Honor turned to the Governor Ujhazy, saying that he was happy to give the company a heartfelt welcome in the city of Philadelphia, and that the American people could deeply sympathise with a people struggling with despots for freedom.

The Governor of Comorn replied in German, and Capt. Binder acted as interpreter.

Meanwhile the crowd clamoured loudly for admission; the doors were opened, and the people poured in steadily for two hours. Great numbers shook hands with the heroine. Among the was a Negro, a fair man, whom she cordially shook by the hand—making no distinction between white and coloured men. The Exiles recorded their names in the book kept in the Hall; and then proceeded, amidst the applause of the people, to Frooi's Daguerrëotype Gallery where they sat for their portraits.

RECEPTION OF HUNGARIAN EXILES IN [illegible]

CELEBRATION OF THE "MAJORITY" OF THE HON. A. H. VERNON.

THE TENANTRY AND PITMEN ASSEMBLING AT "THE TOWERS," AT POYNTON.

Among the festal events which it becomes our pleasurable duty from time to time to commemorate in our columns, there is no custom more purely English than the celebration of the "coming-of-age" of the scions of our nobility and landed gentry. Upon such occasions, the love of the past, which is so fine a feature of the character of the people of England, shines forth with renewed fervour, and fosters that warmth of feeling which should ever prevail between the wealthy and the industrial classes, to ensure the common benefit of both.

Many such scenes of rejoicing, in the true spirit of the olden time, did the estates of the Vernon family in Cheshire, Derbyshire, and Northumberland present on Friday week, the 1st inst., in celebration of the Hon. Augustus Henry Vernon, eldest son of Lord and Lady Vernon, having attained his majority on that day. The principal acts of these festivities was Poynton, about five miles distant from Stockport, where, in the immediate neighbourhood of the old family mansion, lie the valuable "Poynton and Worth Collieries."

It is now some years since Poynton Hall was occupied by the Vernons, and the mansion is in a very dilapidated condition, though it was erected but a century and a half ago. The original abode of the family was castellated, as is evidenced by the two remaining towers.

The Warrens, who were lineally descended from the ancient Earls of Warren and Surrey, are known to have owned the manors of Poynton and Worth since the year 1189. The late Sir George Warren was the direct lineal descendant of Sir Edward Warren, who became possessed of the title of Baron of Stockport about the year 1332. Sir George left only one daughter, who married, in 1777, Viscount Bulkeley; but leaving no issue by this nobleman, the Poynton and Stockport estates were inherited by her niece, the only daughter of Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren, who brought them into the Vernon family by her marriage with the late Lord Vernon, who, by Royal license, assumed the arms and name of Warren in the early part of the present century. This lady, after a life spent in works of charity and benevolence, died at Poynton, in 1837; when her only son, the present Lord Vernon, inherited her estates in Cheshire and elsewhere, including the collieries of Poynton and Worth.

The late Lord Vernon, on succeeding to the property through his wife, invited private enterprise, and let the collieries upon lease for some years; but it was only upon the present Peer's succeeding to the estate that any marked improvement in the mode of working took place. Under the able management of Mr. Thomas Ashworth, at the present moment upwards of 1500 miners are employed in Lord Vernon's pits; and an average daily yield is made, amounting in the year to something like 300,000 tons.

The improved value of the property has, happily, been accompanied by a corresponding advance in the character of the workmen employed. The Poynton colliers are now a very superior class of men to their fellow-labourers in some other parts of the kingdom. Lord Vernon has provided them with comfortable brick-built cottages, and the day's labour is only eight hours. The average wages of the Poynton colliers is about 24s. per week, though some of the more industrious frequently earn 30s.

In addition to a handsome school-house, erected in 1838 by Lord Vernon, the present occasion has been opportunely seized by Lady Vernon to build, at her own charge, another school, closely adjoining the former one, and, together with it, affording accommodation for 300 pupils.

When all these circumstances are considered, the reader will not be surprised to learn that the rejoicings on Friday were of the most enthusiastic character.

On Thursday evening, the Hon. Augustus Vernon, accompanied by his brother, the Hon. W. Vernon, arrived at Poynton, from London, and took up their abode at Barlowfold, the residence of Mr. Thomas Ashworth.

Early on Friday morning, salutes of cannon were fired, and the tenantry and dependents of the Vernon family assembled near the Poynton Colliery offices. They were about 2500 in number, and proceeded in the following order to Barlowfold:—

A party of tenant-farmers on horseback, preceded by a banner inscribed with "Speed the Plough."
A band of music from Stockport.
Blacksmiths, walking three abreast.
A second banner, bearing the motto, "Huzza for Old Ned" (the sobriquet given to all colliery engines).
A party of millwrights and engineers.
Old colliers, two and two.
Miners and others employed in Lord Vernon's collieries, six abreast.
A second band of music, composed of eighteen performers on brass instruments—all of them colliers employed on the estate.
Macclesfield pitmen, in white frocks and green caps, bearing an immense flag, inscribed on one side with "Long live the Honourable Augustus Henry Vernon;" and upon the other, the Warren-Vernon arms, with the motto, "Ver con semper virit."
A third band of music, from Macclesfield.
Seamen and miners.
Railway men, dippers, and banksmen.
Agricultural labourers and colliery carters.
Women and schoolchildren, &c.

Flags and banners were liberally displayed throughout the procession; and as it filed past the hall, the effect was very striking. A temporary hustings, formed of a waggon gaily decorated with flags, was here drawn up outside Mr. Ashworth's garden, at Barlowfold; and when the procession arrived, Mr. Vernon, with his brother, accompanied by Mr. Christy, M.P., and several other gentlemen and some ladies, came out of the house, and presented themselves to the crowd, by whom they were respectfully greeted, the various parties raising their hats as they passed the young heir. The procession then retired to the further extremity of the meadow; and at a given signal, men, women, and children joined in a race across the green sward, cheering most vociferously; and on their reaching the hustings, the dense mass of spectators having formed in front of the waggon, one Hanson Gill, a veteran of thirty-five years' standing in the service of the family, approached the Hon. A. H. Vernon, and read an address of congratulation. The address was signed by upwards of two thousand persons, engrossed on vellum, and enclosed in an ornamental case. Hanson Gill having handed it to the young heir, Mr. Ashworth received it into his charge; and Mr. Vernon replied. The honourable gentleman was greeted with nine times nine good cheers on concluding his address.

PRESENTATION OF THE ADDRESS TO THE HON. A. H. VERNON AT BARLOWFOLD.

Mr Ashworth then introduced Mr. White, of London, who, as the representative of Lord Vernon, expressed his Lordship's high sense of the excellent conduct of those who were employed upon his estate, coupled with his Lordship's regret that the delicate state of his health compelled him to reside abroad, and would not allow him to visit England at this period of the year.

The Hon. W. Vernon then thanked the assembly for the great kindness with which they had received his brother and himself.

Mr Ashworth next briefly and emphatically thanked the spectators for the hearty manner [illegible] and concluded by proposing the health of Mr. Vernon himself expressing [illegible]

A tremendous burst of cheering followed, and then the soldiers, men and boys, proceed ed towards the schools, where arrangements had been completed for the dining of 1530 persons at one sitting, 760 of this number being accommodated in a temporary wooden building, and the remainder in the girls' and boys' school-room. Both the school-rooms and the temporary building were decorated with flags and festoons of evergreens, interspersed with mottoes, and brilliantly illuminated with gas. Each guest was supplied with three-quarters of a pound of fine beef, a pound of bread, and a quart of strong ale. The beef was the produce of two very fine oxen (Sampson and Goliath), fed by Mr. Ashworth, the dead weight of each of which was 2060 lb. The meat was served on a handsome iron-stone china plate, manufactured expressly for the occasion by Messrs. Minton, and bearing the family arms in colours, and surrounded with the title, motto, and names of the estates of the Vernon family. The cups and saucers were similarly ornamented, and, as we l as the plates, were given to the guests as mementos of the feast. They were feasted in two batches, and next came the wives and children of the villagers.

Meanwhile, at Stockport, the church bells rang merrily, salutes of cannon were fired, and flags and banners were displayed; and at about four o'clock, the guests invited to the banquet to be given by Lord Vernon to the Corporation, began to assemble at the Warren Bellamy Arms Hotel, where the band of the 90th Regiment played a variety of popular airs

About five o'clock, the Hon. Mr. Vernon, with his brother, the Hon. W. Vernon, arrived from Barlowfold, accompanied by Mr. Ashworth and Mr. White, and were received with loud cheering. About half-past five o'clock, the guests advanced to the court-house in procession, headed by the band of the 90th Regiment The interior of the court-house was very tastefully decorated for the occasion.

The Mayor of the borough (Mr. Richard Sykes) occupied the chair, having upon his right hand the guest of the evening, the Hon. Augustus Henry Vernon, and upon his left the junior brother of that gentleman, the Hon. W. Vernon. Among the other guests at the cross-table were remarked—Mr. Samuel Christy, M.P.; the Rev. C. K. Prescott, rector of Stockport; Lieutenant-Colonel Eld, 50th Regiment; Mr. Joshua Bradshaw, Mr. R. Marsden, Mr. Thomas Astbury, Mr. Thomas Ashworth, Mr. White (of London), Mr. John Ashworth, and Mr. Henry Ashworth (of Bolton); the Mayor of Bolton, the Mayor of Ashton, the Mayor of Macclesfield, Mr. R. Christy, Mr. John Hadwen, Captain Story, Captain Rees, &c.

The dinner was well served. The bill of fare included fourteen tureens of turtle, and every other delicacy that the season could produce.

After the dessert had been placed on the table, and the customary loyal toasts duly honoured, the chairman, in an address wherein he stated the connexion of the Vernons with the borough of Stockport proposed the health of the Hon. A. H. Vernon, which was drunk with nine times nine good cheers. Mr. Vernon responded to the toast in a feeling manner.

"The health of Lord Vernon, the founder of the feast," was then drunk with all honours, for which the Hon. Mr. Vernon returned thanks. "The health of Lady Vernon and the junior branches of the family" was then duly honoured, and the Hon. W. Vernon acknowledged the compliment.

Then followed the toasts of "The Bishop and Clergy of the Diocese;" "the Members for the Borough;" "the Mayor of Stockport, the chairman of the day;" "the Borough Magistrates;" "the Corporation of Stockport;" "the health of Mr. White;" "the Magistrates of Lancashire and Cheshire acting for the division of Manchester and Stockport;" "the Lords of the manor of Stockport, Worth, steward of the manor and barony of Stockport;" "the Mayor of Bolton;" "the Burgesses of the borough of Stockport;" "the Earl of Chester's Cheshire Yeomanry Cavalry;" and "Chadderton Fields and Lancashire Lads," all of which, but especially the last, were enthusiastically received; after which the company gra dually separated.

The Hon. Mr. Vernon, with his brother and several of the party, went over to Poynton, and gladdened the hearts of the village by joining in their rustic ball at the school-rooms, where the festivities were prolonged until daybreak

On Saturday morning, Mr. Vernon left Poynton for Sudbury Hall, his father's seat in Derbyshire. The village of Sudbury was gaily decorated in celebration of the "majority," and here a large party of the Vernon tenantry were entertained at dinner, the manor of the district being also liberally regaled in honour of the event. The same degree of hospitality was displayed at Wilmington, in Northumberland, and on the other fami y estates.

The arrangement of the festivities at Poynton was entrusted to Mr. Joseph Penny, of Liverpool, who regulated the vast concourse of people with admirable combining the "loud sincerity" of their joy; thus largely contributing to the ample enjoyment of the great event of the day.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The recent open weather has given an impulse to field-sports, and we hear of "good days" in all the hunting districts; albeit, the heavy state of the ground is telling fearfully against the horses; the thorough-breds have alone deserted their stalls for their usual exercise abroad, and the cobs have had to work. Steeple-casting, however, progresses slowly—only one event having come off this week (the Bromley), and the calendar for the next referring only to an amateur meeting on Friday, at Cobham-park. Coursing, however, progresses swimmingly, the fixtures for next week embracing Mamble, on Monday; Wilbury, Combermere, North Berwick, Everley, Hornby, and Cardington, open on Tuesday; and Swinton, on Thursday. The meetings this week have afforded plenty of good sport.

A committee has been appointed to inquire into and settle the mode of procedure in the County Courts, with a view to a more uniform system of practice. Sergeant Dowling, Judge of York district (chairman); Mr. Bruce, of Manchester circuit; Mr. Espinasse, of the Kent circuit; Mr. Turner, of the Sussex and Brighton circuit; and Mr. Gale, of the Hampshire circuit, are named as composing the committee.

PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE.—On Tuesday morning, about six o'clock, the inmates of the Craven Arms Hotel, Coventry, were alarmed by the cry of "Fire," which, upon inquiry, was found to proceed from the room occupied by Mr. George Thomson, son, M.P. for the Tower Hamlets, who had been lecturing, the previous evening, upon financial reform at St Mary's Hall. It appears that the hon gentleman, on retiring to his apartment for the night, had probably put the candle by his bedside for the purpose of reading, when he unintentionally fell asleep, and did not awake until he found himself enveloped in flames. Sir Joshua Walmsley, M.P. for Bolton, who slept in the adjoining room, hearing a disturbance, hastily rushed out on the landing, and, to his horror, discovered flames issuing from the room occupied by Mr. Thompson. We are happy to state, however, that the hon. gentleman escaped without injury.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1850.

THE debate on the Address was languid and uninteresting; and the large majority obtained by Ministers will doubtless have the effect of depriving of much of its formerly anticipated interest the debate on the issue to be raised by Mr. Disraeli in the cause of Protection. In the meantime we are glad to see symptoms of business upon the order-book of the House, in the shape of measures of public utility, to be brought forward by the Government, or by independent members on their own responsibility.

The most interesting debate that has occurred since the opening of Parliament, took place on Tuesday night, when Mr. Hawes, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the grievances complained of in Ceylon, and to report whether any such grievances as might be proved could be redressed, and also whether any measures could be adopted for the better administration and government of the colony. The discussion that ensued was highly damaging to the Government. Mr. Baillie, the Chairman of the Committee appointed last session—a committee composed of gentlemen of all parties, and which agreed unanimously in its report—stated that Earl Grey had insulted that committee as never committee had been insulted before. Government had promised it every facility for the examination of witnesses; and then, when the committee, through its chairman, sent a list of witnesses which it considered absolutely essential to summon from Ceylon, Lord Grey announced that two witnesses had already been ordered to England, and that he should not recognise the [illegible] of the chairman of a committee to dictate to the Secretary of State as to what witnesses should be summoned before it. Mr. Baillie added, and he was afterwards supported by Mr. Hume and other members, that the proceedings of General Haynau in suppressing the bloody revolution in Hungary, were mild, merciful, and legal, compared with the conduct of Lord Torrington—Earl Grey's relative, and one of the family party that governs Great Britain—in suppressing a paltry insurrection in Ceylon. He furthermore accused the Government of attempting to suppress the truth, and to screen Lord Torrington at all hazards. Mr. Disraeli, Sir James Graham, and other members condemned, if not with so much eagerness, at least with equal emphasis, the conduct both of Lord Torrington and the Colonial Office throughout the whole of this business; and Mr. Disraeli moved an amendment amounting to a vote of censure upon Earl Grey. Lord John Russell having declared that he would consider a vote of censure upon Earl Grey as a vote of censure against the Ministry, a great number of members who agreed with Mr. Baillie, but who did not wish to proceed to this extremity, were compelled to vote for the Ministry; and the consequence was, that Mr. Disraeli's amendment was negatived by 140 votes against 68. A second amendment, moved by Mr. Hume, that the witnesses required in the estimation of last year's Committee for the elucidation of the whole truth, should be summoned from Ceylon by the next India mail, was negatived by 109 votes against 100. Further proceedings were nipped in the bud by the adjournment of the House at six o'clock, the standing rule on Wednesdays—a result predicted by those who accused Lords Grey and Torrington, and calculated upon by Mr. Hawes and the defenders of the Ministry. The matter, however, is too serious to be got rid of by such a manœuvre, and will be brought forward again on the first open day. Though the Colonial Office is the sore point of the Ministry, Lord John Russell is not strong enough to brave public opinion upon its mismanagement. The present charge must be fully and fairly met, or the consequences to the Ministry cannot fail to be much more damaging than they have hitherto been.

SOME agitation has been created in Paris by the injudicious conduct of the Prefect of Police, and by the almost simultaneous occurrence of a signal defeat of the Government in the Assembly, and the growth of a difficulty with the Swiss Republic. The present Prefect of Police, a M. Carlier, is a man of a large amount of zeal, and an infinitesimal amount of discretion. Either on his own responsibility, or in obedience to orders from the Government, he resolved that the trees of liberty planted in every quarter of Paris by the foolish populace, immediately after the events of February, 1848, should be removed. Orders were secretly given to the police agents; and in the course of a few days, out of 564 trees of liberty 527 were cut down, including not only the dead stumps dignified with the name of trees, but great numbers that had taken root and flourished. One, more especially, the venerable Nestor of the genus, which had remained intact amid all the political and atmospheric convulsions of the capital since the year 1793, was ruthlessly converted into fire-wood. But not only the extreme faction of Red Republicans, but the great bulk of the lower classes of Paris, looked with some degree of affection and respect upon these memorials of a freedom often fought for, but never yet acquired, and expressed loud indignation at their destruction by the Prefect, who seems to have acted in the very spirit of wantonness, and without the slightest real necessity. Crowds, in consequence, formed in the streets; some slight skirmishes took place, and General de Lamoricière, who happened to pass accidentally along the Boulevards, amid the crowd, was forced to descend from his carriage, and to shout three times in succession, "Vive la République!" The General's obedience to the popular demand did not save him from outrage and assault. He was beaten on the head; and, perhaps, only escaped with his life, by taking refuge in the house of a friend, and thence proceeding, by the roof, to an adjoining tenement, leading to a back street. Although tranquility has been restored, and the Government has declared that it is quite able to preserve the peace of the capital, these occurrences ought to show it its necessity for caution. The materials of disorder and insurrection are in full existence in Paris. The extreme Republican party is far from extinct, and far from being discouraged; and such hot-headed men as the Prefect of Police ought not to be entrusted with the chance of kindling the embers of discontent into the flame of a popular outbreak. To run a muck at these harmless, though, doubtless, very stupid, memorials of the Revolution, was a positive wickedness in the circumstances of the country.

The defeat of the Government in the Assembly is a fact more significant of approaching danger. The question was simply a proposition of the Ministry for the transference of the prefecture and other public offices of the department of the Rhone, from the old and insignificant town of Montbrison, to the new, industrious, and flourishing town of Etienne, which has grown up, within the last twenty years, to be one of the most important manufacturing towns of the second class in France. The Conservative majority—without reason, and either in wantonness of power, or with a predetermination to find or make an opportunity of showing that it merely tolerates, but does not approve, the present Ministry—rejected the measure, by 335 votes against 160. Such an occurrence in England would necessarily be followed by the resignation of the Ministry; but France is in a transition state, and the President—at all events, for the present—must jog on with his Ministry, and endeavour to come to terms with the strong party opposed to it. A dead lock of the Constitutional machine is the present condition of the matter.

The Swiss business is more perplexing one. Switzerland is now, and necessarily will be as long as the Cantons enjoy their present institutions, the place of refuge for political exiles from the neighbouring states of Germany, Italy, and France. London is a safer and quieter, but not always a more accessible, refuge to men who get the worst of it in the uncertain conflict of revolutions; and the consequence of recent events on the Continent has been to fill Geneva, and other democratic towns in Switzerland, with red-hot Communists and Montagnards from France, and with equally execrable demagogues from Baden, Saxony, and Prussia, as well as from Rome and Venice. The French exiles more especially have used, or abused, the hospitality of Switzerland, to circulate incendiary pamphlets and documents, and to convey them in large quantities over the frontier for distribution in Lyons and other towns in the western departments. The consequence has been a great agitation in that part of France, which has at length reached such a point as to compel the French ministry to make a formal demand upon Switzerland for the expulsion of the refugees. The Prussian Government was still more emphatic, and asserted almost in express terms that the independence of Switzerland must be invaded, and its whole system re-considered, if it continued any longer to be a focus of insurrection, or dangerous to the peace of its neighbours. The Swiss Government replied to these menaces by simply stating the fact, that, in July last, of its own accord, it ordered the expulsion of all the refugees who had been civil or military leaders, and who had abused the asylum granted them in Switzerland, naming amongst others, the notorious Messrs. Struve and Mieroslawski. It declined, however, to act upon the dictation of the Powers, or to expel any refugees who had conducted themselves properly and legally in the asylum offered them. Thus the matter rests at present. The Swiss Minister at Paris has, in a note addressed to the public journals, very ably and temperately defended the conduct of his Government; and Louis Napoleon will, we imagine, find it difficult to reconcile to his conscience, or even to good policy, any hostility towards Switzerland upon this pretext. He cannot but remember how gallantly the Swiss Confederation stood by him in his day of adversity, when a similar question was raised against him by the Government of the ex-King Louis Philippe. It would certainly be an odd and humiliating position for France, to find herself attacking Switzerland on a question like this. It is most likely, however, that the affair will ultimately blow over, and that the real difficulties of the French Government will be found in its home, and not in its foreign policy.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE.

At a congregation holden on Tuesday, several graces passed, amongst which was one to extend the time fixed for the report of the Syndicate, appointed on the 31st of October last, "To consider whether any and what regulations may be made with advantage for conducting the examination of candidates for the degree of LL.B.; and whether any and what other measures may be proposed for bringing the law faculty more closely into connexion with the present University system," from the division to the end of the present Lent term. Also a grace, proposing to refer to the Syndicate already appointed to consider the report of the inspector under the Public Health Act, the consideration of the bill about to be introduced into Parliament with regard to certain "contemplated improvements in the borough of Cambridge, the regulation of the markets and fairs thereof, and the regulation of the police," and also to empower the said Syndicate to confer with the authorities of the town as to the contribution paid by the University under the Cambridge Improvement Acts, and respecting the maintenance and management of the borough police force, was withdrawn.

DURHAM.

At a recent convocation, graces were passed for granting to the Warden and Senate £807 1s. 6½d. above the sum annually placed at their disposal, the expense of £920 having been incurred in erecting the new buildings at Bishop Hatfield's Hall, and the remainder in necessary repairs upon the property of the University. Graces were passed for putting the University seal to several leases.

TESTIMONIALS.—The following clergymen have recently had testimonials of esteem and affection presented to them:—The Rev. J. H. Raven, on quitting the Curacy of Mitchenhall, which he had filled for upwards of fifteen years with zeal and fidelity, by the parishioners; the Rev. Joseph Wilkinson, Incumbent of Redcar, by Mrs. Greame, of the same place, a beautiful pocket communion service of silver; the Rev. Francis Robert Traill, late Curate of St. Augustine's, Bristol, from some of his former parishioners; the Rev. William Alexander Osborne, Head Master of the Northern Church of England School, on his resigning the Head Mastership of the Free Grammar School of King Edward VI., at Macclesfield, by the inhabitants; and the Rev. John Allen, Head Master of Ilminster Grammar School, from his former pupils.

THE SALE AT MARLBOROUGH HOUSE.

THE Sale of the effects of the late Queen Dowager commenced on Tuesday morning. On the previous day several of the Royal Family, and a few leading members of the aristocracy, had a private view of the property. Several purchases were made, including the plate, bought by Lord Albert Denison for a sum approaching £10,000. Her Majesty the Queen bought two dessert services of porcelain: one of Sèvre china, the other of Dresden. His Royal Highness Prince George, his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, his Serene Highness Prince Frederick of Hesse, the Countess of Mount Edgcumbe, Viscountess Palmerston, and Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, were among the visitors on Monday.

The invitations were from ten to four o'clock, and throughout Tuesday the principal saloons of the mansion were filled with a succession of visitors, including many leading connoisseurs and collectors. Among the more distinguished company we remarked the Duchess of Norfolk and Lady Adeliza Fitzalan Howard, the Duchess of Sutherland and Lady Constance Leveson Gower, the Marquis of Stafford, the Earl of Jersey and Lady Clementina Villiers, the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert and Mrs. Herbert, the Countess Dowager Waldegrave and Mr. Harcourt, M.P., the Viscountess Forbes, Lord Ashley, M.P., Colonel Sibthorp, M.P., Mr. Quintin Dick, M.P., Lord Ernest Bruce, M.P., the Marquis of Douro, Lady Charles Wellesley and Lady Anaora Pierrepont, the Duke and Duchess of Northumberland, Admiral Lord George Seymour, &c

The arrangements, by Mr. Owen, to whom the Sale has been confided, were highly satisfactory. The company, on entering the mansion, passed into the state dining-room, where was a large quantity of foreign table-linen. A long handsome dessert service of ruby glass, and some elaborate vases were also displayed here: and upon the walls were large whole-length portraits of King George III. and Queen Charlotte, marked at £50. After passing through an ante-room, the company entered the state drawing-room, where tables were covered with articles of vertu, and small ornamental furniture, which readily found purchasers, from the prevailing anxiety to possess some memorial of the lamented Queen.

On Wednesday the company was still more numerous than on the previous day. Among the visitors were his Excellency the Hanoverian Minister, the Countess Grey and Miss Copley, Viscount and Viscountess Newport, the Hon. Mrs. G. Anson, Baron Koller, Sir Edward Sugden, &c. Amidst the purchases, a silver dripping-tray, once belonging to Queen Charlotte, of indecent design, and of small intrinsic worth, sold for £15. A portrait of the late Queen's favourite horse, Timour, has been purchased by Mr. Heald, M.P.

The applications at Mr. Owen's residence, in New Bond-street, have been extremely numerous; and it has been announced that no more tickets will be issued until Monday, when the contents of the upper floors of the mansion will be removed to the lower rooms

We believe that a much larger quantity of property remains to be disposed of than was originally expected, owing to her Majesty the Queen having declined to purchase effects contained in Bushy House, on which subject negotiations have been pending.

The mansion will not be opened to-day (Saturday), but the Sale will be continued throughout next week.

It is in contemplation to erect a new church for the populous parish of Fisherton Anger, in the borough of New Sarum, which is rendered necessary by the general decay of the fabric of the old church, which is a very ancient building, we believe, the oldest church in the diocese of Salisbury. The new church is not yet fixed upon, but it is supposed it will be erected on a piece of ground near to the proposed terminus of the Wilts, Weymouth, and Somerset railway.

Advices have been received from Sydney up to the 4th of October last. The ship Mountstuart Elphinstone, with convicts, had touched at Port Phillip, on her way to Moreton Bay. Amongst the prisoners were Messrs Martin and Dogherty, two of the leaders in the attempted insurrection in Ireland in 1848.

At Glasgow, on Sunday, a boy, thinking to steal some whisky, seized a bottle, and hastily swallowed a portion of its contents, which proved to be vitriol. A quantity of carbonate of soda was instantly administered, and by that means the effects of the vitriol were in some degree neutralised, but the patient, who now lies at the infirmary, is not expected to recover.

NOVEL CURE FOR THE CHOLERA.—The following is an extract from a letter, dated Andelot, in the department of the Haute-Marne, the 31st ult.:—"The cholera suddenly appeared a few days since in the small commune of Eoot. There were five deaths in two days. In order to create a diversion to the panic caused by the scourge, M. de Bourgus thought of an expedient, which was attended with complete success. He invited the population to a wild boar hunt. The hunt lasted five days, and forty-two wild boars were killed. Since then not a case of cholera has appeared."

The vessel Orion, arrived from Leghorn, has brought as a portion of a general cargo 6000 marble disks. The vessel in which this importation took place belonged to Holland, and therefore this is an instance in which a Dutch vessel has been employed to bring an Italian cargo to this country for home use, which would not have been allowable until the repealed laws of navigation and importation came into operation.

EXPERIMENTS WITH BALLOONS.—Mr. Shepherd, civil engineer, attended at the Admiralty, at one o'clock on Thursday, to exhibit his plan for circulating printed notices of the positions of the searching vessels when they reach the arctic regions, by the means of balloons sent up with the notices attached by a cord, which is liberated, and the notices scatter in the air when a slow match burns a certain period of time. Their Lordships, with a numerous party of ladies and gentlemen, went into St. James's-park, where the experiment took place, to witness the balloons being sent up. The first balloon stuck on one of the trees in the garden. The next was of larger dimensions; and when it went up, it hovered for some time over the park, and then made rapid progress for a short period, ultimately alighting in the meadow of a dairyman named George Dickens, at Rotherhithe. In a glass bottle attached to the balloon was a notice that the person finding it would receive a reward of £3 on bringing it to the Admiralty. Mr. George Dickens, who, singular enough, is an old sailor, and received a naval medal about a fortnight ago, brought the balloon to the Admiralty by a quarter-past two o'clock, and received the promised reward from Rear-Admiral Beaufort. The third balloon sent up was found at Charlton, near Woolwich, and brought to the Admiralty in the course of the afternoon

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

The Royal theatricals at the Castle (noticed elsewhere) have proved the great feature of Court life during the past week.

Her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess Stephanie of Baden, accompanied by the Marquis and Marchioness of Douglas, and attended by her Lady in Waiting (the Countess of Ingelheim) and a Gentleman in Waiting (Baron Schreinkenstein), closed her visit to her Majesty and the Prince on Saturday. In the evening of the same day, the Royal dinner party included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Sutherland, and Lady Caroline Leveson Gower, Lady Fanny Howard, the Baroness de Speth, the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk and Lady Adeliza F. Howard, Lord Edward Howard, the Right Hon. Sir Robert and Lady Peel and Miss Peel, and the Rev. Dr Philpott.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, her Majesty's visitors, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel on Sunday morning.

On Monday, there was no addition to the Royal dinner party.

On Tuesday, the Duchess of Kent, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar dined with the Queen and the Prince after the Privy Council.

On Wednesday, the Prince Consort went out hunting, attended by Lieut.-Col. the Hon. A. Gordon. The Earl of Aberdeen arrived at the Castle the same evening, on a visit to her Majesty.

On Thursday, H.R.H. Prince Albert went to London, and presided at a meeting of the Royal Commission for the Promotion of the Exhibitions of the Works of Industry. Their Excellencies Monsieur and Madame Van de Weyer, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster, and Lady Octavia Grosvenor, Viscount and Viscountess Mahon, and Lord and Lady Ashley arrived the same evening on a visit to the Queen and the Prince.

The Marquis of Ormonde has relieved Lord Camoys in his duties as Lord in Waiting to the Queen. Colonel the Honourable A. N. Hood has relieved Major-General Sir Frederic Stovin in his duties as Groom in Waiting to her Majesty.

Colonel Buckley has relieved Lord Charles Fitzroy in his duties as Equerry in Waiting to the Queen; and Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. Alexander Gordon has relieved Lieutenant-Colonel F. H. Seymour in his duties as Equerry in Waiting on his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

The Queen held a Privy Council at one o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, at the Castle. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord President; the Earl of Minto, Lord Privy Seal; Lord John Russell, First Lord of the Treasury; and all the other Cabinet Ministers.

At the Council her Majesty picked the list of Sheriffs for the different counties of England and Wales during the present year.

The Right Hon. William Sebright Lascelles, Comptroller of her Majesty's Household, had an audience of the Queen, and presented to her Majesty the Address from the House of Commons.

The Earl and Countess of Hardwick have arrived at Patterson's Hotel, from the Continent.

Viscountess Palmerston held her second soirée this season on Saturday last, at the family residence in Carlton-gardens.

Lord Campbell gave a Cabinet dinner on Wednesday last, at Strathden House.

Lord and Lady Feversham and the Hon. Miss Duncombe have arrived in Belgrave-square, from Paris.

The nuptials of Lady Olivia Montagu, only daughter of the Duke of Manchester, with Lord Osmuiston, M.P., only son of the Earl and Countess of Tankerville, were celebrated on Tuesday last, at Kimbolton Castle, the ducal seat, in Huntingdonshire.

The Speaker of the House of Commons commences his customary Parliamentary dinners before Easter, this day.

Mr. Repton, M.P., and Lady Jane Repton have arrived at the Duke of Leinster's, on Carlton-House-terrace, from Warwick Castle.

We are emabled to state, upon authority, that the Hon. Miss Campbell, eldest daughter of Lord Campbell and the Baroness Stradbroke, will, early in the course of the ensuing spring, be led to the hymeneal altar by the Rev. Spranger White, of the Close, Roxburghshire. The nuptials of Major Fane, son of the Rev. Edward Fane, rector of Fulbeck, with Miss Hannah Williams, daughter of Sir James and Lady Mary Williams, will also shortly be solemnised.

Mr. Ewart, M.P., Mr. Borthwick, Mr. Herbert Ingram, Mr. Spicer, Mr. Francis, Mr. Pratt, Mr. M'Enteer, Mr. Pitman, and several other gentlemen, representing a large and influential portion of the London and provincial press, had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on Wednesday, on the subject of the repeal of the advertisement duty.

Lord John Manners has commenced an active canvass, with every prospect of success, of the borough of Colchester, the representation of which is vacant by the retirement of Sir G. H. Smith.

On Wednesday week, Mr. Toke Simmons, of Canterbury, for a wager, galloped one of his celebrated brown horses, "Water Gay," twenty miles, leaping in the first seven miles twenty hurdles, within two minutes and a half of an hour. Previous to starting, at the request of Mr. Simmons, two veterinary surgeons were appointed to see that no cruelty was exercised towards the horse during the race.

A new writ having been moved for a representative of the borough of Windsor, in consequence of the resignation of Lord John Hay, Mr. Hatchell, the Solicitor-General for Ireland, has issued an address to the electors soliciting their suffrages.

We understand that the stewards of the Jockey Club have declined the match proposed by his Highness the Pacha of Egypt.

A treaty has been agreed upon between the plenipotentiaries of her Majesty and the President of the Republic of Liberia, establishing reciprocal freedom of commerce, treating each other on the footing of the most favoured nation, and engaging (on the part of Liberia) that a law shall be passed declaring it to be piracy for its subjects to be engaged in the slave trade.

THEATRICAL PERFORMANCES AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

On Friday evening, the 1st instant, the first of the dramatic performances took place at Windsor Castle, the temporary theatre being fitted up in the Rubens Room, as at the first series of representations.

At a quarter before eight o'clock, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, and the Princess Alice, entered the theatre, accompanied by her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess Stephanie of Baden, the Marquis and Marchioness of Douglas, the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, the Countess of Jersey, the Earl and Countess Spencer, Lady Peel, and the other visitors at the Castle. The Queen and Prince were attended by the Duchess of Sutherland (Mistress of the Robes), the Marquis of Breadalbane (Lord Chamberlain), and the other Ladies and Gentlemen in Waiting.

The selected party had been honoured with invitations to the performance, consisting of his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the Countess Dowager of Mansfield, and the Ladies Murray, the Dowager Lady and the Hon. Miss Leveson Gower, Lady Fanny Howard, Viscount Mandeville, Hon Mrs. Charles Grey, Lady and Miss Farquhar, Lieut.-Col. Hon. G. B. and Mrs. Phipps and Miss Bathurst, Lieut.-Col. F. H. and Lady Emily Seymour, the Provost of Eton and the Hon. Mrs. Hodgson, the Hon. and Rev. Edward and Mrs. Moore and Miss Moore, Sir George and Lady Cooper, Miss and Mr. Cooper, Rev. Dr. Hawtrey, Mr. and Mrs. Grote, the commanding officer of the 1st Life Guards (Colonel Hall), two officers of the Life Guards (Hon. D. C. de Ros and Lord Rokeby), the commanding officer of the Grenadier Guards (Colonel Thornton), two officers of the Grenadier Guards (Captain Clifford and Lieutenant Burrard), Mr. Birch, and Mr. Glover.

A part of the theatre was appropriated for the accommodation of a number of the domestics of the Royal household.

Her Majesty's private band was in attendance in an ante-room, and played the overture and different pieces between the acts.

The following was the programme of the dramatic performance:—

ROYAL ENTERTAINMENT.

THEATRICAL PERFORMANCE IN THE RUBENS ROOM, AT WINDSOR CASTLE.—(SCENE FROM "JULIUS CÆSAR.")

Scene, during a great part of the play, at Rome; afterwards at Sardis, and near Philippi.

Director	Mr. Charles Kean.
Assistant Director	Mr. George Ellis.
The theatre arranged and the scenery painted by	Mr. Thomas Grieve.

The King's Drawingroom (or the "Rubens Room," as it is generally termed, from several of the finest paintings by Rubens hanging on its walls) is not the largest of the state apartments; but, as it was the express wish of her Majesty that the arrangements necessary for the theatrical performances should not shut up or interfere with the suite of state rooms generally visited by the public, the Rubens Room was selected as best adapted for the purposes required.

As our Illustration shows, the ceiling of the apartment is massive and large in its panelled decorations: and has, besides, a bold margin, enriched with roses, shamrocks, and thistles. The panels are ornamented in their centres by devices, consisting of the star of the Order of the Garter, surrounded by a wreath of oak leaves and sceptres placed saltire-wise, the angles of the cross being filled up by sprays of oak, and the rose, shamrock, and thistle. Circles, surrounded by palm, laurel, and oak wreaths, enclosing the monogram G.R., the Royal arms, stars, &c., are in the coving of the ceiling. The walls are covered with crimson satin. The theatre occupies the northern end of the room, and the floor is raised between two and three feet above that of the room; and on the front of this raised part is appropriately inscribed, in old English characters, "All the world's a stage." The proscenium is painted to represent oak carved-work, the pattern of the decorations on the margin of the ceiling being repeated on the pilasters, to carry out a general harmony of appearance; and the other portions of the decorative enrichments to the proscenium are of the Elizabethan character. The effect of the proscenium is extremely pretty and characteristic. Standing on the stage, and looking towards the auditory, the appearance of "the house" is very rich, crimson and gilded work being the chief decoration. For her Majesty and Royal visitors, a platform, three steps in height, is erected, and covered by a magnificent Persian carpet of the richest texture; and on it are placed gilded chairs of Gothic design; whilst crimson curtains, suspended from brass rods, bound the platform on each side. On either hand are ranged three rows of seats, somewhat after the fashion of an amphitheatre, rising on steps; and as these are of crimson, the effect is particularly rich and pleasing. Four candelabra are placed close to the wall, behind the seats, and these are all the lights in the room, as the chandelier is removed, and consequently there is no unnecessary quantity of light to destroy the effect of those on the stage.

Of the character of the scenery it is scarcely needful to speak, as the mention that it is by Grieve is sufficient to prove its exquisite beauty.

The scene we have illustrated is the second scene of the third act, where Antony commences his oration over the dead body of Cæsar.

MICHIGAN GREAT CENTRAL RAILWAY DEPOT.

This extensive range of buildings presents a specimen of the vast scale upon which railway dépôts are constructed in the United States. The site of the structures once formed part of the bed of the river Detroit, which has been filled in at a vast expense, and the Dépôt founded upon piles. It is one of the largest works of its class in the States having a water front of nearly 1900 feet, and a wharf 40 feet wide, with a depth of water in the dock ranging from 12 to 22 feet. The Dépôt itself is 100 feet wide, and 600 feet in length. Two storehouses have lately been added, together with a circular engine-house, 120 feet in diameter the vast dome of which is prominent in the Illustration.

The department for passengers is 300 feet long, and 76 feet wide, and has fire-proof offices in front, making the whole building 325 feet long. Vessels lying at the wharf can directly load and unload from the warehouses, without any cartage. From Detroit the line of rail takes a westerly course, entirely across the peninsula, a distance of 220 miles, to New Buffalo terminus, on Lake Michigan whence the communication is continued across the Lake, 60 miles, to Chicago Illinois, by steam-boats. Two trains are despatched daily, making the transit of nearly 300 miles in twenty-four hours; whereas the journey round the Lake is 750 miles and occupies four or five days.

"THE POST-OFFICE."—PAINTED BY F. GOODALL.

OPENING OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

THE Exhibition of the British Institution was opened to the public on Monday last, and an unusually copious Notice of a majority of the Pictures will be found in the SUPPLEMENT, published gratuitously with the present Number of our Journal. We this week engrave two of the first-class works in the collection.

"THE MILLER'S HOME," BY T. CRESWICK, A.R.A.,

is engraved from Mr. Creswick's principal contribution. Our Illustration exhibits with fidelity the poetic nature of the composition, which is true to English scenery and English rural life. The execution of the picture is, as we have elsewhere observed, in Mr. Creswick's best manner.

"THE POST-OFFICE," PAINTED BY F. GOODALL, is a kind of Domestic Wilkie's "Waterloo Gazette." The story is well told, and is meant to indicate the arrival of an Indian Mail with the news of a dear-bought victory. The consequential character of the barber, who is reading aloud, is capitally rendered; but we must refer our readers to another part of our paper for a fuller criticism on this clever picture.

We shall resume our Illustrations next week.

THE SCIENCE OF DEEP DRAINING.

THE art of draining the pocket is so generally practised, that it needs no explanation; but the art of draining the soil is pursued only by a few, and they seem little acquainted with the science. At present, however, as in the year 1640, when Walter Blyth published "The English Improver," England's hope and England's welfare are both closely connected with deep drainage. To that the farmers are told to look, to enable them to compete with all the world in supplying our markets with food. It is said to increase the value of land already cultivated and paying a good rent, 60 per cent.; it will, therefore, be an admirable substitute for the Corn-Law, and will have the double advantage of feeding the people abundantly and enriching the landlords. The reverse of class legislation, it will benefit all, and injure none. We may help forward the progress by laying before our readers, from the last Number of the Quarterly Review, published within these few days, an outline of its principles, so that they may be understood by mere amateurs, as well as by farmers who practise the art.

The curious and apparently contradictory facts, that applying water to the surface of the soil, and draining it away that both wetting and drying the ground promote vegetation—have long been known and practised. To drain marshes, and to irrigate the sides of hills and extensive plains, are among the most useful and celebrated works of former ages. What was done on a grand scale for the Pontine Marshes and the plains of Lombardy is equally desirable, and must be done, if we would have the land fertile, for every rainy meadow in England. It has long been apparent—from the necessity to burn down the rank weeds or bushes that cover the soil in a state of nature—that all the food on which man subsists is the produce of tillage. Wheat and maize and cabbages, as well as peaches, cherries, and apples, in their present condition, are all the result of art, whose efforts Nature smiles on and blesses. That fact teaches us to hope even for our own seasons. No competitors can surpass us, whatever may be their soil and their climate, except they be more skilful and industrious than ourselves. Corn does not grow spontaneously; it is the produce of labour, and the most skilful labourers will, in the end, produce, whatever may be the soil they occupy, the cheapest corn. To what extent art may yet improve the soil—giving to that which may be naturally barren the richest fertility—we cannot know; but the effect of drainage and watering, as manifested in various countries, removes far beyond our present vision the bounds of improvement, and convinces us that every foot of land in England may be made to yield as much to industry and skill as "fat Kvesham or Lincoln fen."

It is very nearly a century since Draining (of which alone we mean to write a few words) was brought much into practice amongst us, by the discovery and zeal of Joseph Elkington. Water is found in two distinct conditions in the soil, which require different treatment. It lies on or near the top, mingling with the leaves and surface roots of plants, and forming a quagmire; or it percolates thoroughly the surface for a few inches or one or two feet, and there meeting some impervious or less pervious material, such as clay or sandstone, lodges there and becomes as stagnant as a green pool, though not (like it) mantled over with vegetation. It is much more easy to remove the former, and the means are more obvious, than the latter. They chiefly consist in laying the soil so as to force the water to run away. The water under the surface is more difficult to get rid of. Elkington noticed that in the great majority of such cases the soil was of a gravelly nature, lying in a dipping position, and resting on obdurate clay or sandstone horizontally deposited, and he accordingly set to work to intersect by a bore-hole well sunk to the lowest point of the gravel, he could drain the whole of the surface. His discovery and his exertions were rewarded by some public celebrity and a Parliamentary grant of £1000. His augur was compared to Moses's rod; and since his time, draining, with successive improvements made by Mr. John Reed, of Horsemonden, by Mr. Smith, of Deanstone, and various other persons, has come extensively into use. At present, under the stimulus of competition, though it had been neglected for years, it seems likely to be applied—as it assuredly may be successfully done either to remove the surface or the underground water—to every field in England.

The great advantages of draining are derived from raising the temperature of the soil, and from admitting, or rather compelling, the atmosphere to take the place of the stagnant water around the roots of plants. The average temperature of England approximates to the isothermal line which would run from Rome to the northern and hilly parts of Scotland: it will not ripen: and in many summers in England it ripens imperfectly. As wheat is, on the whole, the most valuable crop, to that which other crops approximate in figure, whatever tends to ripening, by raising the temperature of the soil, ensures a larger crop of better quality. The evaporation of water, as is well known, produces such great cold, that by its means in hot climates water is cooled or even frozen. Evaporation is always rapid, and the cold great in proportion as the water is minutely divided and spread over a large surface. Draining draws the water, which is spread over a large surface, into a body: it diminishes, in fact, the evaporating surface, and the quantity of water to be evaporated. The consequence is, that the temperature of the field to which drainage is applied is raised, as shown by the experiments of Mr. Parkes, at least ten degrees higher than the undrained field which is undrained. The crop ripen better—there is more corn grown, more saved, and it is of a better quality.

Water, it is well known, is a bad conductor of heat applied to its upper surface. The upper portion, if heated, flies off in vapour, but transmits no heat to the portion below. About the temperature of 40° water attains its greatest density; raised above or sunk below that, it expands. In summer the temperature of the air is on the average 20° higher than the temperature of water at its greatest density. If the latter be left on the soil, the warm air cannot penetrate to the water has been evaporated. But the atmosphere contains the elements of vegetable life. It is a necessary nearly for the roots as the leaves of plants, and the effect of draining away the water is to leave the ground open for the air to penetrate. In fact, the pressure being equal on all sides, as we prevent the formation of vapour, and draw off the water below, we compel the air to sink and penetrate into the soil. It follows in the same. The great use of ploughing and harrowing the ground is to clear it of weeds, and expose all the broken-up clods to the action of the sun and air. Draining has similar effects, and is as good as two or three ploughings and harrowings. In a wet or a summer fallow, with the advantage of its action being continual. By draining away the water, we place the surface of the earth, as it were, under an exhausted receiver, and force the water to rise from every part where it was had occupied. The operation, however, has no tendency in winter to cool down the surface below the temperature of the air. Before that reaches the freezing point, or before it can affect the surface, this begins to expand. It resists, therefore, the admission of air cooled down to the freezing point. When formed into ice, it expands, and helps to break up the masses of earth into crumbling fragments. If after the thaw, it be withdrawn below by drainage, the air that has been above the thawed temperature, enters freely into the soil, increases the heat of the surface, and promotes vegetation. That is, we believe, the theory of the very rapid vegetation of countries in high latitudes, when the warm air from low latitudes sets free the hard frozen soil.

The great advantages, then, of draining, are that they increase the temperature of the soil, and penetrate it with air instead of stagnant water.

A practical question of importance is the depth of the drains. The best authorities contend that they should not be less than four feet, or four feet six inches deep. Now, it is ascertained that water, by the force of attraction, will rise upwards amongst the particles of soil as it rises in a sponge of which one end is immersed in water. To what depth evaporation extends is not ascertained, but it is known that water will rise by attraction, as well as by evaporation, in moss soils, from a depth of eighteen inches. To cut off its supply the drainer must go considerably deeper, and thirty inches below is not supposed to be too much to secure against all evaporation except that which falls on the surface. Those who have investigated the phenomena scientifically, therefore, have fixed on four feet as the proper depth for drains.

Being convinced of the necessity of draining, and that the drain should be four feet deep, then comes the question, how is it to be made? It is clear that the best conduit is a pipe made of short earthen tubes with collars, like the water-pipes that are laid down in the streets, the end of one fitting into the collar of another, so as to guard against the entrance of earth. In laying these pipes, according to the plan now in use, the labourer never plants his foot within twenty inches of the bottom. The sides of the trench in which the pipes are laid are not even perpendicular, but shelve in, and the trench is made so narrow at the bottom as just to admit the collar of the pipe to be let in. Such trenches and pipes are ascertained to form the most lasting drain, to be the least liable to be impeded by roots or vermin, and to be at once easily laid and efficacious.

A particular set of tools is required to make the drain and lay the pipes, and the workmen must learn the art. Common agricultural labourers, without specific teaching, are not competent to the work: and the introduction of deep draining is one of the many new arts introduced of late into the agricultural districts, which require in the peasantry superior knowledge and attainments. It is a general fact, that the professors of new arts are better paid than those of old ones; and the improvement of the peasantry must necessarily be the consequence of live hints that, at first sight, appear likely to deprive them of employment and bread.

A STRING OF VALENTINES.

LUCY.

O LUCY, should the wind and rain
Refuse to visit earth again;
Should sunshine, while thou livest, dear,
Deny the foliage of the year;
Should roses cease to be bud and blow,
Or wicked rivers fail to flow,
Why Lucy, then, my heart no more
Might doat upon thee as before:
But till that day I make it thine,
And claim thee for my Valentine.

JANE.

O CRUEL, but bewitching Jane!
I'll never trust a maid again!
I had a house not long ago,
A house to let—as well you know—
Well-built, well-order'd, furnish'd fair,
And open to the sunny air.
But you, sweet thief, one summer-day,
Went by, marauding on your way,
And found, without a bolt or bar,
The windows up, the door ajar;
And entering, as it were your own,
Kindled a fire and sat you down,
And there remained, in spite of me,
The lawful owner of the fee,
As if 'twere clear beyond a doubt
That law must fail to turn you out.
Dishonest Jane! to act such part!
But take the house—oh, take my heart.
I'll make the roguish tenant mine,
And seize for rent—by Valentine!

MARY.

MARY'S eyes! they haunt me ever,
In the dark I see them glowing!
Mary's lips! sweet lips that whisper!
Fair are they as cherries growing.
Mary's cheeks! the sweetest peaches
Ripen'd in the sunniest autumn,
Could not match the white and crimson
Which her youthful years have brought 'em.
Would those eyes look love on me,
Chief of mortals I should be!
Would those cheeks for me but glow,
I would envy none below!
Would those lips say "Love, I'm thine,"
I'd kiss them!—by Saint Valentine!

ANNE.

THY simple name, beloved Anne,
Is music to mine ear,
Three other little words alone
Are half so sweet and dear.
My Anne! my life! my love! my wife!
Three out of four are mine.
Oh, give me right to use the fourth,
And be my Valentine!

ELLEN.

WHEN speaks the Lady of my love,
The very air, with music swelling,
Vibrates with pleasure great as mine,
And owns the loveliness of Ellen.

When smiles the Lady of my love,
Her face is like the morn in splendour;
And roses bloom upon her lips
Drawn by that sunshine to attend her.

When sighs the Lady of my love,
All nature sympathizes duly;—
She shall not sigh, if constant dwell
In heart of him who loves her truly!

Ellen—my Nelly and my Nell,
Each name a beauty—be thou mine;
I've loved thee long, I'll love thee well—
I claim thee for my Valentine.

KATE.

O BLACK-EYED, witty, pretty Kate—
The sweet antipodes of Hate—
I've got a mortal wound from thee;
Oh, aid in my calamity!

O Kate, O blushing Kate, be kind!
Thou art exactly to my mind.
Thou colourest all my waking thought,
My nightly dreams with thee are fraught.

O Kate, refuse me not a boon—
A walk at rising of the moon;
A look, a word, a touch, a sign,
That thou wilt be my Valentine!

CAROLINE.

WELL thy name becomes thee, Cara!
Chanting, trilling all day long,
Sweetest singer, kindest maiden,
Soft, as is thy song.
Carol ever to enchant me,
Carol ever, Caroline,
Only sing or say—"I love thee!"
And I'll be thy Valentine.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH FRANCE.—The Presse devotes more than two columns to the details connected with the project of a submarine electric telegraph between France and England, for which Mr. Brett has obtained a privilege of ten years from the French Government. It appears from this account that the contract binds Mr. Brett to have his telegraph completed by the 1st of September next, but the French Government reserves to itself the right of stopping the works before the 1st of September, in the event of circumstances occurring to render this measure indispensable. A joint-stock company, under the name of Brett, Tochè, and Co., the seat of which is to be Paris, has been formed, with a capital of 750,000fr.; but Mr. Brett undertakes to complete the telegraph across the Channel for 459,000fr. The two points fixed upon are Cape Grinez, near Calais, and the Shakspeare Cliff, near Dover. The distance between these points is only 21 miles English; but the line of telegraph, consisting of seven wires properly covered, is to be 33 miles, to allow for oscillations.

THE BAR OF PARIS.—The Council of the Order of Advocates at Paris has come to a decision in the case of the advocates who threw up their briefs on the occasion of the Versailles trials, for not being allowed to plead in defence of their clients the violation of the Constitution. The decision is as follows:—1. A protest against M. Dupin's speech of the 29th ult. was water had occupied. The operation, however, has no tendency in winter to cool down the surface below the temperature of the air. Before that reaches the freezing point, or before it can affect the surface, this begins to expand. It resists, therefore, the admission of air cooled down to the freezing point. When formed into ice, it expands, and helps to break up the masses of earth into crumbling fragments. If after the thaw, it be withdrawn below by drainage, the air that has been above the thawed temperature, enters freely into the soil, increases the heat of the surface, and promotes vegetation. That is, we believe, the theory of the very rapid vegetation of countries in high latitudes, when the warm air from low latitudes sets free the hard frozen soil.

The great advantages, then, of draining, are that they increase the temperature of the soil, and penetrate it with air instead of stagnant water.

A practical question of importance is the depth of the drains. The best authorities contend that they should not be less than four feet, or four feet six inches deep. Now, it is ascertained that water, by the force of attraction, will rise upwards amongst the particles of soil as it rises in a sponge of which one end is immersed in water. To what depth evaporation extends is not ascertained, but it is known that water will rise by attraction, as well as by evaporation, in moss soils, from a depth of eighteen inches. To cut off its supply the drainer must go considerably deeper, and thirty inches below is not supposed to be too much to secure against all evaporation except that which falls on the surface. Those who have investigated the phenomena scientifically, therefore, have fixed on four feet as the proper depth for drains.

Being convinced of the necessity of draining, and that the drain should be four feet deep, then comes the question, how is it to be made? It is clear that the best conduit is a pipe made of short earthen tubes with collars, like the water-pipes that are laid down in the streets, the end of one fitting into the collar of another, so as to guard against the entrance of earth. In laying these pipes, according to the plan now in use, the labourer never plants his foot within twenty inches of the bottom. The sides of the trench in which the pipes are laid are not even perpendicular, but shelve in, and the trench is made so narrow at the bottom as just to admit the collar of the pipe to be let in. Such trenches and pipes are ascertained to form the most lasting drain, to be the least liable to be impeded by roots or vermin, and to be at once easily laid and efficacious.

A particular set of tools is required to make the drain and lay the pipes, and the workmen must learn the art. Common agricultural labourers, without specific teaching, are not competent to the work: and the introduction of deep draining is one of the many new arts introduced of late into the agricultural districts, which require in the peasantry superior knowledge and attainments. It is a general fact, that the professors of new arts are better paid than those of old ones; and the improvement of the peasantry must necessarily be the consequence of live hints that, at first sight, appear likely to deprive them of employment and bread.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

THE CHORAL HARMONISTS held their second meeting for the season last Monday evening, at the London Tavern. In the first part, Haydn's fourth mass; Hummel's preludes, "Quod, quod in orbe!" two sacred airs by Mollique, from the 103rd and 130th Psalms, were sung by Miss Dolby; Mr. Lockey gave Beethoven's song, "O beauteous daughter of the starry race!" and Mr. Lawler sang in Mozart's motett, "Redemptor Mundi Deus." Weelkes' madrigal, "Now is the bridals of fair Thoralis!" Mr. W. H. Holmes' fine descriptive scena, "The Blind Flower Girl," admirably sung by Miss Dolby; the grand scena from Weber's "Der Freyschütz," "Before my eyes behold him," powerfully rendered by Miss Birch; Mr. J. L. Hatton's song, "Bird of the Wilderness," charmingly sung by Mr. Lockey; Rossini's "Gaza Ladra" overture; Spohr's "Nonetto," ably played by Messrs. Dando (violin), Belleni (viola), Hatton (violoncello), R. Reinagle (contra-basso), Clinton (flute), Horton (oboe), Lazarus (clarionet), Godfrey (bassoon), and C. Harper (horn); and gleanings from Haydn's "Seasons," were included in the second part. There was an agreeable variety in this selection, which was creditably executed. The third concert will be on Monday, the 25th inst.

The great source of attraction at the sixteenth of the LONDON WEDNESDAY CONCERTS, on the 6th inst., for the benefit of Ernst, was his playing of Mendelssohn's new concerto in E minor for the violin that he composed. Ernst's execution of this fine work is well known to be one of his grandest triumphs. In addition to the concerto, Ernst performed his "Ludovic" and "Pirate" fantasies, and his "Andante" and "Carnaval de Venise" giving his admirers quantity as well as quality in the evening's programme.

Miss Ellen Lyon, a pleasing vocalist, and Signor Nappi gave a soirée musicale on Tuesday, at Blagrove's Rooms, Mortimer-street, assisted by Madame Masterton, Miss Eliza Lyon, Misses Charman, Messrs. Land, Benson, and Lawler; with Messrs H. R. and W. Blagrove, Watkins, Phillips, Camus, S. J. Noble, W. H. Holmes, J. Thomas, Mrs. J. Macfarren, and Miss Rushforth, as instrumental players.

Mr. Milne, with the Misses Smith, gave their entertainment of Scotch Melodies at the Music Hall, last Monday. On the same evening Mr G. Lake had a concert at the Lecture Hall, Walworth. On Tuesday evening, Mr. F. W. Thomas held his third quarter and sole concert at the Marylebone Institution; and Miss Murrell, on the same night, gave a concert in St. Martin's Hall.

The first subscription Classical Chamber Concert of Mr. H. C. Cooper and Mr. F. W. Hancock was given last Monday, in the small room, Exeter Hall. The executants were Mr. Lindsay Sloper (pianoforte), Messrs. H. Blagrove and Cooper (violin), Mr. Hill (viola), and Mr. Hancock (violoncello). The Quartets were Mozart's No. 2, in D minor; Mendelssohn's No. 1, Op. 44, in D; and Beethoven's, Op. 132, in A minor; with the Trio, Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello Trio, in B flat, of Beethoven.

Of Handel's "Saul," performed by the SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, on Friday, at Exeter Hall, we must reserve our notice for our next. Great pains have been taken with this performance, the scene having been carefully copied from the MS. of Handel in her Majesty's library, Mr. Cossa writing the additional accompaniments. The principal vocalists were Misses Birch, Stewart, and Dolby; Messrs. Benson, T. Williams, Lawler, and H. Phillips; Mr. Bromwich presiding at the organ, and Mr. Cooper being first violin. Some of Handel's finest choruses are in this oratorio, such as the "Gird on thy sword," "Envy, eldest born of hell!" "How excellent is thy name!" "Preserve him for the glory." The celebrated "Dead March" is also in this work.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—This evening (Saturday), at the St. Martin's Hall, the 31st concert of the Society of Musicians will be given.——On Monday night, the first public performance in the great room of St. Martin's Hall will take place, conducted by Mr. John Hullah; on which occasion Mr. Henry Leslie's new "Festival Psalm," for two choirs, will be executed for the first time. The opening of the Hall was inaugurated last Thursday evening, by a festival and banquet, at which many noble and influential patrons were present.——On Tuesday next, a concert will be given at the Hanover-square Rooms, for the benefit of Mrs. Sewell and Miss Horn, sisters of the late composer Charles Horn. Prince Albert and the Duchess of Gloucester have kindly given their patronage. The scheme will comprise selections from Mr. Horn's "Romantic Oratorio, Faust Prediction," and divers songs, duets, glees, &c. of his writing. The most eminent vocal and instrumental talent will give their aid on this occasion.——M. Blaetz's third and last séance musicale will take place on Tuesday next, at the chamber concert of Messrs. Cooper and Hancock on Thursday; and the fourth concert of the Society of British Musicians on Saturday.——Mr. Sternedale Bennett's second series of Classical Pianoforte Music will commence on the 18th inst.——The Philharmonic Concerts commence on the 4th of March.——The 112th anniversary festival of the Royal Society of Musicians is fixed for Friday, March 15: his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge will be in the chair.——The Distins have been playing this week at the chief towns in the Western counties.——The "Domino Noir" of Auber, the "Zampa" of Hérold, and the "Caïd" of Thomas, have been given this week, at the St. James's Theatre. Next Monday, A. Adam's opera, "Le Roi d'Yvetot," the production of which fell in his original part.——Halévy's "Valley of Andorre" has proved a great success for the Princess's Theatre; a work for three soprani, three tenors, and two basses, is excellently executed.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The Grand French Opera has had a fortunate début in M. Meillet, a pupil of the Conservatoire. He bids fair to be one of the best baritones of the day. He appeared in Franiz, in Flotow's opera, "L'Ame en Peine:" and in the second act, he obtained the almost unprecedented honor of an encore in the air, "Depuis le jour j'ai paré ma chaumière." Meillet, whose name alone, in Meyerbeer's "Robert," is much liked in Paris, has performed, for the first time in French (her own language, by the way), Lucia, with distinguished success.——Mdme. Viardot, having recovered her voice, appeared last Monday in the "Prophète." Marseilles has been the first town to mount this work: it was done on the 23th ult., and created quite a furore. Mdme. Steiner Beauce was Fidès; Mdme. Didiet, Berthe; Madame Fargues, Inès; Mdlle. Zaidet, Zacharie; Martin, Jonas; Vial, Oberthal. The chief dancers were Mdlles. Névoni, Diendonné, and Maceline, with M. Mégé. The first act—the scene of the revolt, the skating scene, the coronation, and the last act, produced the greatest impression. Accounts have also been received of the "Prophète" at Hamburg, on the 25th ult., and Amsterdam on the 29th, when produced in German. It was to have been ready for the 30th, at the Theatre Royal in Dresden, where Meyerbeer himself superintended the rehearsals; and from which city he was to go to Berlin, to mount the work ready for Viardot's arrival. It was to be played in Vienna about the 10th inst.; and it had also been adapted for the Hungarian language at Pesth. The preparations for the revival of the "Huguenots" here, for Madame Viardot to sing Valentine in French (she has already sung it in Italian at London, and in German at Berlin) reveal that opera with a renewed interest. Roger will be the Raoul; Levasseur, Marcel (his original part); and Mdlle. Nau, Urbain will be the Marguerite, in which she created such a sensation when the opera was given by the Belgian company in London.——Mdlle. Castilaza has made a somewhat suddenly appeared at the Grand Opera last week in Leonora, in Donizetti's "Favorita:" she was suffering too much from nervous excitement to show whether she still possessed the powers she exhibited at her début in 1841.——At the Italian Opera, Rossini's "Donna del Lago" has been revived, with Mdlle. Vera as Elena, and Mdlle. Nau in the male part. Emely Ernesta Grisi in Malcolm; Moriani, Fuegenes; Fiavio, Roderick Dhu; and Morelli, Douglas.——As soon as Mdme. Persiani is recovered from her indisposition, Mozart's "Don Juan" will be given, as the first Parisian production. Signor Tamburini is the former Rossini will play the Don, to Lablache's Leporello, and Lucchesi, Don Ottavio.——The Government has proposed to the Committee of the Italian Opera to take a grant of 400,000 francs to uphold the Italian Opera-house under Ronconi's direction.——Ahlzard, the great French bassoon, died at Marseilles, on the 23rd ult. But for his dwarfish stature and corpulent person, Ahlzard might have been the Paganini of his age. He had a magnificent organ, and sang with impassioned feeling. His Marcel and Zerstrans were fine performances.——Rossini, who was one of the pall-bearers at the funeral of Bertolini, the sculptor, the other day, at Florence, is recovering. Meyerbeer is still at Berlin, where he has been joined by Jenny Lind, the Swedish nightingale. Joachim, the violinist, is creating a great sensation in the musical circles.——We have also several players here: De Beriot, De Kontski, Rosenhein, Cossmann, Batta, Godefroid, Alard, Ropiquet, Cavillon, Maurin, Franchomme, Demonck, &c.

BALFE'S OPERA OF "THE BONDMAN."—Letters from Berlin, dated the 26th ult., state that, under the title of "Der Mulatte," Balfe's popular opera, "The Bondman," was produced on the preceding evening (Friday, Jan. 25), at the Royal Theatre, with the most complete success. The composer conducted his own work. The orchestra consisted of twenty-four, all excellent players: the stringed instruments are excellent, but the wood and brass are somewhat wanting in tone. The chorus was effective. Madame Coster was to be great in his music. The air, but sings in the rudy Teutonic style of dragging the time; she was more successful in a new scena expressly written for her, in the third act, than in the well-known ballads "Child of the Sun" and "It is not fame, it is not fate," two of the airs most charming melodies. Herr Mantius was the Bondman: he does not look the Mulatto "Trichina," and he lacks vocal power; but no played the part with feeling and tact. Both the prima donna and tenor were called for at the end of the opera. The fine dramatic finale of the second act ensued for Balfe an ovation, which was renewed at the fall of the curtain. He had every reason to be proud of his triumph. The King and Queen of Prussia, and nearly all the members of the Royal Family, were present. Every Royal box (there are six in this beautiful theatre) was filled. The State box is in the centre of the house. The Earl of Westmorland occupied his box; and the assemblage of diplomacy rank, and fashion was immense, every place having been let for days before. The King of Prussia, on leaving the theatre, expressed to the manager his wish that the "Bohemian Girl," which has been so triumphant at Vienna, Frankfort, Hamburgh, &c., might be speedily represented in Berlin. It should be mentioned that the Berlinese dilettanti are generally very critical and difficult to please in musical matters.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

Mr. Anderson has clearly marked out his own path of management. It is particular, and he has proceeded with it with his own peculiar musical tastes, not by any general rule to be predicted as a system of management. Pieces associated with his provincial and transatlantic experiences, but which are almost unknown to London, may be therefore expected in success on the stage of Old Drury. Of these, the "Fiesco" of Schiller, adapted by Mr. Planché, is one. Of German plays hitherto fitted for the English theatre, this is certainly the most amiable, but as certainly not the greatest of its poet's works. The meanest specimens of German drama, such as the "Stranger," and the "Robbers," were first imported into this country, and courage is yet wanting to produce the best. Schiller himself thought poorly of "Fiesco;" why, consequently, should an English manager prefer it to "Wilhelm Tell" or "Wallenstein" as one of the highest works of dramatic art in the world? Mr. Planché has thought it expedient to abridge the dialogue and modify some of the situations; but in fact, to render the entire play acceptable, it wants rewriting. Nothing in it but the idea is good: the structure and situations are defective, though the latter are frequently suggestive. The want of domestic interest was severely felt on Monday; and the political matter is scarcely up to the mark in these times, when the questions thereto pertaining are so much better understood than they were in the "first period" of Schiller's poetic career. The effect of the play was much marred by the heavy manner in which it was acted, and the long intervals suffered between the acts. Never was the patience of an audience more put to the test. Mr. Anderson, too, was clouded by hoarseness from doing justice to his conception of the hero. Nevertheless, he acted with persistent vigour. Mr. Vandenhoff, in Verrina, was occasionally great; and, indeed, through the alteration of the denouement, and the force of the situations in which he is engaged, was throughout the true hero of the drama. Miss Laura Addison, as Leonora, was replete with "good intentions," but her efforts were too spasmodic to be pleasing. Notwithstanding all drawbacks, however, the drama is a noble one; and, though it was coldly received on the first night, is likely to grow upon the public. It is put on the stage in a costly manner, and, as a novelty, deserves welcome and a fair trial.

OLYMPIC

On Monday night Mr. Gustavus Brooke was welcomed by a crowded audience, and inaugurated his new season with his old favourite character of Othello. This excellent actor has now another chance of success, and it is to be hoped that he will use it better than he did his former one. Mr. Davenport, as Iago, exceeded expectation, and gave to the part an original and effective interpretation, in which sarcasm was the prominent element. Mrs. Mowatt, as Desdemona, was both interesting and touching. The tragedy was well mounted.

STRAND.

On Monday, Fielding's comedy of "The Miser," was revived. We need scarcely add that this play is an adaptation of Molière's "Avare"; but it is so much reduced in its proportions, that the character of the original is almost lost. Mrs. Glover, however, was exceedingly expressive as the cranberumid, Lappet; while Mr. Farren, in the hero, reminded us of better times. The chances of a run are but slender.

More promise pertains to a trifle, called, after a series of papers in Punch, though not founded on them, "A Scene in the Life of an Unprotected Female." It is by Mr. Sterling Coyne, and presents us with Mrs. Sterling in one of those parts in which she is so excellent one in which she has the whole stage to herself, and fills it. As the niece of an old wigmaker, imprisoned in her chamber, she makes the most of her solitude by getting up a communication with her fellow-lodgers in the house, who talk to her, and squabble among themselves, behind the scenes. Next, she becomes histrionic; imitates Mrs. Glover as Mrs. Hradebury, and enacts the balcony scene of "Romeo and Juliet," by aid of a wig-block. All this is admirable and lively, and will doubtless prove attractive.

HAYMARKET.

Mr Douglas Jerrold's drama of "Nell Gwynne" has been successfully revived at the Haymarket. Miss Reynolds, in the heroine, more than fulfils the expectation that she has excited. Her progress in her profession is gradual, but sure. The wit of this piece atones for its defective structure; and excites applause for the details, which else it would not command as a whole. The dialogue is exquisitely keen.

SURREY.

On Monday "Othello" was revived, with Mr. Creswick as the Moor, and Mr. Mead as his tempter.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE ROYAL CRUISE OF 1850.—It is understood that her Majesty will proceed on her summer cruise, in the Royal yacht, Victoria and Albert, much earlier than usual this year. The Royal yacht is ordered to be taken out of dock by the 25th of March, and be ready for sea, in every respect, by the 1st of April. It is reported that the Victoria and Albert will make an experimental trip to Gibraltar in April; and it will depend upon her performances during that trip whether Admiralty will undertake the visit to the celebrated Rock.

THE COMPTROLLERSHIP OF THE COAST GUARD. -As some incorrect reports are in circulation with respect to this office, vacant by the appointment of Captain Houston Stewart, C.B., to be a Lord of the Admiralty, we are confidently state that Captain Alexander Elliot, R.N., who has filled the office of comptroller of steam machinery, at Somerset House, since December, 1846, and which office is now to be absorbed in that of Surveyor of the Navy, becomes the new Comptroller-General of the Coast Guard.

Captain George Frederick Rich has been appointed Captain-Superintendent of the Royal William Victualling Yard and Naval Hospital at Plymouth, vice Captain Nicolas, superseded.

ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—The Lords of the Admiralty, on obtaining the sanction of the House of Commons, on Tuesday evening, lost no time in deciding as to the plan to be adopted for another expedition, to proceed by the Straits of Davis's Straits, Lancaster Sound, and onwards to Melville Island, in search of Captain Sir John Franklin, and the officers and crews of the Erebus and Terror; and an express messenger was despatched from the Admiralty on Wednesday afternoon, to Woolwich, with orders to Commodore Henry Eden to get the Acorn, 18, sloop, and Miner, steam-vessel, ready for sea at the shortest notice. The messenger was also bearer, at the same time, of despatches for Captain Sir John Ross, Knight, superintendent of the victualling-yard, Deptford, to have the necessary provisions ready to be sent to Woolwich, and put on board those vessels. The Acorn is at present at Chatham, but she can soon be brought round to Woolwich, and made ready for sea. The Miner is a steam-vessel, propelled by the screw; and the last trial she had, when fitted with the disc engines, gave a remarkably favourable result, with a very small consumption of fuel, an object of the greatest importance in a voyage to the Arctic regions. The engines have since been tried for a considerable number of hours consecutively, and found to continue to work well, without being liable to get out of order, and appears to be in every way adapted for the undertaking to the Arctic seas it is now employed upon. It is her Lordships should decide on using those engines now on board the vessel.

USE OF SPIRITS IN THE ROYAL NAVY.—Eleven of the members of the naval board assembled to measure out the rum of sparits in the Royal Navy, and resolved on Wednesday at Whitehall. The other two members have not yet joined. The following is a complete list of the members of the board:—Admiral of the Fleet Sir Thomas Byam Martin, G.C.B., Vice-Admiral of the United Kingdom; Admiral Sir Charles Adam, K.C.B., Lieutenant Governor of Greenwich Hospital; Vice-Admiral Sir Thomas Cochrane, K.C.B., Rear-Admiral Sir George Seymour, C.B., G.C.H.; Capt. K. Collier, C.B. (1814); Capt Amar Lowry Corry (1811); Capt. Sir Thomas Herbert, K.C.B. (1822); Capt. Charles, C.B., of the Excellent (1820); Capt. Peter Richards, C.B. (1828); Capt. Sir Charles Hotham, K.C.B. (1833.); Capt. W. H. Henderson, C.B. (1838); Capt. John Kingcome (1838); Capt. Cospatrick B. Hamilton (1847); Capt. H. Pelmell, one of the senior clerks at the Admiralty, Secretary.

PUBLIC INCOME AND EXPENDITURE.—The first return of the present session was printed on Monday, containing the annual account of the public income and expenditure for the year ending the 5th inst., with a statement of the balances in the Exchequer, &c. The net income of the year was £52,951,748 18s. 5d., and the expenditure £50,953,622 16s. 4d., leaving as excess of income over expenditure of £1,998,126 2s. 1d. The balances in the Exchequer on the 5th of January in the previous year were £8,109,561 13s. 10¼d.; and at the close of the financial year, the 5th ult., they amounted to £9,748,539 12s. 4¾d. There was advanced in the year £1,989 014 4s. 6d. for local works, under various acts of Parliament, including £1,417,077 15s. for drainage, Poor-law unions, and railways in Ireland. The repayments or advances for local works were £1,170 752 13s. 1d. in the year.

The Presse of Paris states that the Royal library of Brussels has just acquired, for the library of M. Brisard, of Ghent, a curious and rare volume. It is a copy, printed on satin, of the second edition of a work entitled "Moral and Political Maxims, taken from Telemachus, on the science of Kings, and the happiness of the people, printed in 1756, by Louis Augustus, Dauphin (afterwards Louis XVI.), for the Court only. A manuscript note at the head of the copy contains the following anecdote: "As soon as the Dauphin had concluded the printing of the work, he had a few copies bound to make presents. One of them was for Louis XV., his ancestor. His Majesty opening the volume, read the article, and said to the Dauphin, 'Monsieur the Dauphin, your work is finished, break the type.'" The article was as follows :—"When kings have once broke down the barriers of good faith and honour, they cannot re-establish the confidence necessary to them, nor bring back to the principles of virtue and justice the men whom they have taught to despise them; they become tyrants, their subjects rebels, and nothing but a sudden revolution can bring back their power to a normal state." The original edition of this volume was made in the very apartment of the Dauphin himself, then aged twelve years. The Count of Provence (Louis XVIII.) and the Count d'Artois (Charles X.) were present at the lithographic operations. The Dauphin printed every copy.

CHESS IN THE UNITED STATES.

As the forthcoming great match at Washington, between Mr. C. Stanley and the American amateur, Mr. J. H. T., has awakened a very lively interest in this country, the publication of the two following games, in which the latter figured as a competitor, may serve to gratify the very natural curiosity which has been excited as to the pretensions of this amateur to enter the lists against an adversary so formidable and experienced as the acknowledged Champion of the States. It is right to add that this game was played as far back as 1847, and can hardly, therefore, be cited as a criterion of the present strength of Mr. T.:—

(a) The sacrifice of the Bishop at this point although productive of many striking situations is hardly to be commended, when the defence is in the hands of an experienced player.

(b) White avails himself skilfully of the advantage his opponent has made him.

(c) If K to K sq (ch), and when the King moved to Q 3d, Q to K B 5th (ch) would have won at once as obnoxious.

(d) If Q to her 4th, he loses the Q; and if B to K 3d, White would answer with R to K sq, but any move at all attack.

(e) K to K 2nd might yet have saved the game.

(f) Threatening mate next move.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS.—A return made to the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. Monckton Milnes, shows that the number of juvenile offenders committed to prison in England and Wales in the year 1847, was 11,195. In the year 1848, it was 11,795. Of those committed in 1847, the number who had been before committed was 7734; who were unable to read, 5206; who had not been brought up to any definite employment, 5176. Of those committed in 1848, the number who had lost one parent was 2057; who had lost both parents, 594; who were unable to read, 5206; who had not been brought up to any definite employment, 5727. In 1847, the number of those whipped in prison once was 992; twice, 80; thrice, 3; four or more times, 1. In 1848, the number whipped in prison once was 1617; twice, 98; thrice, 8; four or more times, 3. In 1847, the number committed who had been once convicted before was 3043, who had been twice convicted, 812; thrice, 254; four times, 322; five times, 126; more than five times, 191. In 1848, the number committed who had been once convicted before was 1817; who had been twice convicted, 876, thrice, 386; four times, 334; five times, 191; more than five times, 230. Appended to the return is a list of "charitable institutions for affording temporary refuge to young offenders when discharged from prison." They are 63 in number.

THE FEAR OF THE WORLD; OR, LIVING FOR APPEARANCES.

BY THE BROTHERS MAYHEW.

THE whole room was in a commotion. The visitors had collected round Nicholls, and, half laughing, seemed to enjoy the sport of "coming in at cousin," as some called it. One or two of the more stately mammas surrounded by their daughters, were already excusing their rapid flight to the pale Mrs. Nicholls; and, in their politeness, begging of her not to imagine that this disagreeable little affair, or that disgusting Jew's horrid, horrid conduct had driven them away—whilst inwardly they vowed that henceforth they were always "out" to the Nicholsses.

When Mr. Isaacs had legally served two more "razor strops," as he called them, he bowed to the company and advanced to the door. On the mat he stood for a moment, and, smiling at Nicholls, told him that there were two more "shentlemen" waiting for him outside, adding that the servants would not believe they were invited to the party, and let them in, because, they said, corduroys were not full dress. With a graceful smile and bow, he requested to be informed whether he could deliver any message to them.

The company tittered at the man's impudence. Nicholls bit his lip and stamped his foot, and the lace-bound handkerchief fell from Sara's hand as swooning she sank upon the ottoman. In less than half an hour the drawing-room was empty. One by one the visitors shook Nicholls by the hand, looking mournfully in his face, and assuring him of their undisguised sympathy. Many wished to heavens they could offer him any assistance, and regretted the event had not happened two days before, for then they had large sums of money lying by them that they did not know what to do with.

But, when once these generous men had passed the drawingroom door, Nicholls could hear the half-smothered chuckle, that gave the lie to all the offers they had made. No, it was fun to them. It would be talk for the next week to come. All the clubs would ring with the anecdote; and, as far as his darling world was concerned, he was henceforth a ruined man.

So Nicholls, still half stupid with his drink, sat on one of his gay amber-satined ottomans, listening to the laughter and loud talking in the hall. Then came the shouts of the linkmen and the rattling of carriages, and he could smell the perfume of the cigars that had been lighted in the hall.

At last all was silent, except the rattling of plates and spoons in the supper-room beneath. The writ had spirited all the friends away as though it had been a fairy's wand. The "strop" was a magic one.

CHAPTER XI.

WHEN Nicholls awoke the next day, he found the shutters closed, Sara risen, and the clock at three. His head was on fire, and his tongue seemed thick and clung to his palate. He rang the bell, and his wife entered. As she opened the shutters, the daylight shone full upon her pale face, and red, swollen eyes, and Nicholls half raised himself in his bed with astonishment at this sudden change in her. But yesterday he had gazed upon her, her eyes brightened by excitement, her cheeks red with pleasure, and her figured satin gown clinging to her slender waist, and he had thought to himself he had never seen her look so well—no, not even on the day she first wore that black velvet gown he gave her. He had looked round the drawingrooms, when they were most crowded, he had examined each belle with the nicest care, and had been forced to admit—despite a slight tiff whilst dressing—that his Sara was the finest woman in the room. His heart had swelled with pride as he saw some of the "men"—manchioned exquisites, who knew every point of beauty in a woman as though she were a horse—leaning against the door-posts, their eyes riveted upon his wife, evidently envying the fate of her lucky husband.

He could not call to mind the exact particulars of the scene that had taken place last night, but he had a dim, confused notion that something dreadful had occurred. Depressed with the excess of wine he had taken, and annoyed at the strange appearance of his wife, he sank back on his pillow, too much in want of a little consolation himself to sympathize with her.

Sara had evidently expected him to say something soothing. She stood for a moment near the bed, but not a word was spoken. At last she broke the silence.

"Will you have anything?" she asked, in an injured tone, as though a severe quarrel had taken place.

"Soda water," was the gruff and laconic reply.

As Nicholls tossed about in his bed, he by degrees called to mind the writs that had been served with. One thought seemed always to rise before him—that of the forgery upon Reuben. He remained almost motionless, his eyes fixed on the window, repeating the act, and trying to recal the sequel of the scene he had figured in. He had not even the energy to rise, but lay turning and twisting the one thought of the forgery over in his mind, made almost torpid under the depression of his excesses. At last the daylight began to fade. The gas-light opposite the house was lit, and sent the reflection of the window on the ceiling. Then he remembered the soda-water, and gaining a little energy from his rising passion, he seized the bell and rang it angrily.

Sara, silent and sullen as before, entered the room.

"I told you to let me have some soda-water," he cried, looking fiercely at her. "I can't get any," was the reply. "Why?"

"Because there are three men waiting outside, and I'm afraid to let any one go out."

The husband felt the force of the objection. He returned no answer, but remained silent, watching the reflection of the gas-lamp on the ceiling. Sara stood for an instant, without moving a limb; but, the silence continuing, she took her departure, closing the door as quietly as if she had quitted a sick-chamber.

About eight o'clock Mr. Nicholls came down to dinner. Even then he spoke as little as he possibly could. He stood with his coat-tails up, warming himself before the fire, his eyes fixed on one of the straw mats on the table. Sara thought to herself that he might as well have made some slight apology for keeping the dinner waiting an hour; but, seeing him look so pale and wretched, she excused him.

At dinner-time they remained silent. Any one would have imagined they had had a violent quarrel. The dinner was one to have pleased the most fastidious, but still he would not draw it into conversation. The dishes—all of them the remains of the overnight's revelry—were removed and replaced, the clatter of the plates, and knives, and forks sounding loudly in the room. The poor barrister was thinking of the miserable end all his silly dreams had come to. Each mouthful he ate had to be paid for. He had obtained it all by a means he dared not think of; had spent his money even before he could call it his own, to please his darling world; and it was clear, by the last night's scene, that it was not at all grateful for the sacrifice. He was cut to the quick with the failure. The disgrace stung him to the heart. "What would they think of him?" he kept asking himself, not daring to dive any further into the question. At last he made an effort and spoke.

How much wine did they drink last night?" he asked.

"I don't know," answered his wife quickly, determined not to give in, but to let "her gentleman" have all the conversation to himself, since he appeared to like quiet so much.

"Then I wish you would count the bottles," continued Nicholls, glad of an excuse for finding fault; "what the deuce is the good of my trying to save expense, if you will keep no check upon the servants?"

Just then the pound-cake elephant was placed upon the table. It was uncut, and inspired Nicholls with a fresh subject for a noise.

"It really seems to me, Sara, that you wish to see me in the Gazette."

"I don't understand you, sir," was the dignified answer.

Pointing with a fork to the elephant, he continued, "Nonsense, madam; if you had thought for one moment, you would have known that the confectioner would have taken that cake back again. It is really no use for a man to strive and"

"He wouldn't. I asked him, and he only handed in his bill and demanded his money," returned Sara, interrupting him.

Again they were silent, until Nicholls, warmed with his wine, began to lose his headache. Then he thought to himself, it would be much better to conciliate his wife.

"Do you think the servants know anything about what happened last night, my dear?" he asked Sara, in quite an altered tone.

"I don't know," was the unflinching reply.

"There, don't let us quarrel, Sara," said Nicholls, taking her hand. "I am miserable enough as it is. If you leave me, I won't answer for the consequences?" and he gazed at the ceiling madly, in such a way that Sara grew quite alarmed, and fell upon his neck, clasping him to her.

With his arm round her waist they stood before the fire, and he got his darling to tell him all that had taken place at the party. Then came the great question, How would it be possible for them to regain their standing in the world?

"It is hard," cried Nicholls, "after all my strugglings, after all my battlings with my creditors, after all the money, the frightful amount of money I've paid, to be knocked over in this way—it is hard. And, after all, I wouldn't mind betting a thousand pounds"——

"My dear!" cried Sara, expostulating.

"If I had it, my pet, I wouldn't mind betting it, that nearly every one of those very people that cut us, are just in the very same state as I am in; but I'll fight 'em all, I will."

"How, dear—how?" asked Sara, anxiously.

"I don't know," was the reply. "I'll get Lively Harry to say that he did it for a lark. If I could have paid the scoundrel, I shouldn't have cared; in fact, it would have looked all the better. Oh, curse the write! it drives me mad to think about them. Why didn't I put off the party?" he added half musingly, as his thoughts still returned to the forged bill. "Now all is lost. I am indeed a ruined man."

Sara did not interrupt him for some minutes. At last, wishing to lead his thoughts away from the subject, she asked him, "How, dear, did you ever manage to settle with the jeweller—you never told me?"

Nicholls's arm fell from her waist; he clasped his forehead tightly, and bit his lip. Presently, as she repeated the question, he answered in an angry voice, "Women have no business with money matters."

"I only wanted to know, my dear. I didn't mean to offend you," replied his wife, with all her woman's curiosity alive on the subject.

"There are three men waiting outside, and I'm afraid to let any one go out."

"Never ask me again, then. I am going out. Get my hat," stammered out Nicholls, not daring to remain in the house lest the secret should escape him.

At this moment there was a knock at the door. His troubled mind immediately fancied that it might be some message on the same all-dreaded subject.

"Who's there?" he shouted.

"All right!" a man's voice replied; and a gentleman who had gained admission on pressing family matters, tired of waiting below, advanced without ceremony into the room, and handed to the unfortunate man a writ for sixty pounds, at the suit of Messrs. Cocker and Co., wine-merchants. Nicholls was so astounded and enraged that he could not speak and Mrs. Nicholls was dumb with fright; not a word, therefore, escaped from the pair, as the lawyer's clerk, with a polite bow, hastened from the room and quitted the house.

This seemed to be the climax of the tragedy. Both (startled and confounded with the unexpected blow) gazed mutely one at the other. At last Nicholls, jumping from his seat, paced the room—cursing and swearing, and throwing his arms wildly about him. Sara, bursting into tears, sat in her chair, thinking of the contrast there was between her present gilded misery, and the happy home her girlhood had known at Reuben's farm. The brother's uncouth, yet honest warning rang in her ears; and in her heart she wished she had listened to his counsels.

"It's all up, now," cried Nicholls. "Hang the world!—hang everything! Fool—idiot—fool that I have been! The game's lost. A prison—worse than a prison—(and he struck his forehead)—stares me in the face! Oh, what a dear lesson it has taught me!"

Suddenly turning to his wife, he added, in a tone almost of reproach, "Sara, to-morrow we leave this cursed house. What there is, these vultures of the law may have. Whilst I have yet my liberty, we must fly. Once let me be put in prison, and I am a degraded wretch for ever. Even you would not dare to own me, and my children would be things to point at."

Unable to fathom the meaning of his mysterious words, Sara, startled from her own grief, looked inquiringly in his face, and saw, in the misery that it expressed, how the confession had been wrung from an agonised heart.

"Yes, Wellesley," she cried, "let us leave this house, and, in quitting it, try and forget all our sufferings. We have but one friend in the world now—a friend that is true to us, I know, though, in our pride and folly, we spurned him from our door. Let us go to Reuben—there we shall meet with comfort and welcome."

"It's impossible!" shouted Nicholls—"once for all, it's impossible! I would a thousand times rather meet a prison than your brother;" and, flinging himself on the sofa, he buried his face in the cushion.

At this moment a postman's knock rang through the house. The barrister leapt to his feet again. "Let them come!" he shouted; "bring it up—let me know the worst at once, and put me out of this agony of suspense. What's the lawyer's name, and how much is it?"

As Parker tapped at the door, Mrs. Nicholls advanced to it, opening it only sufficiently to admit the boy's arm. She was still afraid lest the servants should guess their misery.

"Good heavens! it's from Newcastle, and all in black," she cried. "Janet's handwriting, too! what can it mean?"

A ray of hope shone in Nicholls's face as he snatched the letter from his wife. Breaking the seal savagely, he devoured its contents, his wife standing close to him, impatiently waiting for the news.

On the 21st instant, the very day of Nicholls's memorable party, Sir Giles had breathed his last—as his daughter said, "without a groan."

As Mrs. Nicholls took out her white cambric handkerchief, her husband soliloquised, "Poor old man! poor old fellow!" and, having shaken his head three or four times, he added, "Well, taking all in all, the dear old gentleman was better than many fathers. Really," he continued, as the colour returned to his cheeks, "really, it seems as if a Providence was hanging over me. I declare, I am no sooner in a mess, than something or other is sure to turn up to take me out of it. Poor old man! By the by, tell Parker, my poppet, to look out my black clothes. Poor old man! It's no use grieving, my pet; we must submit to the will of Providence—its ways are inscrutable, my love. See, I bear this heavy blow like a man."

"It's a sad, sad loss," simpered Mrs. Nicholls from behind her handkerchief; "he was such a dear old gentleman!"

"It'll be at least a fortnight before we can prove the will and touch the money," said Nicholls, unconsciously revealing the current of his thoughts. Yet he was not an unfeeling man; but his distresses, and his fear of the world, had deadened his heart, and made him for a long time past regard his father only as an interloper who stood between him and affluence.

"I think my friend Cocker will be rather savage when he hears of this. That scoundrelly landlord, too, won't be best pleased. Ah, this is sweet revenge! Ha! ha!"

"Hush! Wellesley dear," interposed Mrs. Nicholls solemnly, as for a moment she removed her handkerchief. "Hush!—laughing whilst your father lies above ground in his coffin. What a sudden bereavement! There's scarcely any time to think of mourning. I wish I had not had my black velvet gown cut up for the children," and she sobbed aloud.

"Never mind, my dear," said her husband, soothingly; "don't give way to this grief. Be comforted, and you shall have as many black velvet dresses as you like."

And when his wife, in answer, had kissed him, he told her that he was determined to write round to all his creditors, and tell them to send in their bills in a fortnight. "It will look so well," he added, "to say that all who have any claims upon the estate of Wellesley Nicholls, Esquire, will be paid in full."

"How shall we manage about the papers, my dear?" asked Sara; "of course, you will have to insert the advertisements?"

"Oh, I'll see to that," answered the husband. "All that it is necessary to state is, that—that we sincerely regret him, and that the bereavement has plunged several distinguished families into mourning. That's very easily done."

For an hour at least they sat planning the manner in which the father should be mourned, and they retrieve the disgrace they were so nearly sinking under. Nicholls begged of his wife not to think of the foolish words that had escaped from him in his grief, as only the wanderings of a mind overstrained by long anxiety. The livery for the servants was fixed upon, the amount of the debts calculated, and a slight dispute as to whether black or white was most becoming to Mrs. Nicholls's complexion amicably settled.

The next train that started for Newcastle carried with it Mr. Wellesley Nicholls.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

FREDERICK HENRY PAUL, SECOND BARON METHUEN.

The occasion of seconding the Address immediately on taking the oaths and his seat, was the first appearance and maiden speech in Parliament of the present Lord Methuen. He was born, February 23, 1818, was for a short time Cornet of the Royal Horse Guards, afterwards an Ensign in the 71st Foot, and in 1842 retired from the army. He married, October 14, 1844, Anna Horatio Caroline, only daughter of the Rev. John Samford, of Mynehead, Somerset, and in 1846 was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of the Wilts Militia. His father, who was born June 21st, 1771, married, July 31st, 1810, Jane Dorothea, eldest daughter of Sir Henry Paulett St. John Mildmay, and had for many years a seat in the Commons, as representative of the county of Wilts. He was raised to the peerage, July 13th, 1838, by the title of Baron Methuen, of Corsham, in the county of Wilts, and died during the recent Parliamentary recess.

The family of Methven, or Methuen, is one of ancient distinction, and has its name from the barony of Methuen, in Perthshire, given by Malcolme Canmore, King of Scotland, to a German of some note, who, about the year 1070, came to England with Queen Margaret of Hungary.

John Methven, a descendant of this German, was Secretary of State in Scotland A.D. 1440, and from him descended John Methuen, of Bishops Cannings, Wilts, who, in the reigns of William and Queen Anne, was sent, first, as Chancellor to Ireland, and afterwards as Ambassador to Portugal, where the celebrated wine and wool treaty, signed at Lisbon on the 27th of December, 1703.

This treaty, deemed at the time, and for nearly one hundred and thirty years afterwards, of the greatest importance, came to an end in 1831, by our abolition of the differential duty in favour of Portugal, and against French wines. The prohibition of our woollen manufactures was not renewed; they continued to pass into Portugal in some quantity for home consumpt on, but much more largely for the purpose of being smuggled into Spain.

Sir Paul Methuen, Knight of the Bath, son of the above John Methuen, inherited the diplomatic talent of his father, and held severally under Queen Anne and George I. the offices of Secretary of State and Comptroller of the Household, and was sent as Envoy to several foreign states, and as Ambassador to Madrid. In all instances he gained the character of a man of the highest honour and uncompromising integrity. During his residence in Italy he made a large collection of valuable pictures, and obtained considerable celebrity for artistic taste. He left no son, and was succeeded by his cousin, Paul Methuen (to whom he bequeathed his pictures), of Corsham House, Wilts, M.P. for Warwick. This cousin was son of Thomas Methuen, by Anne, daughter of Isaac Self, of Benacre. He married Penelope, daughter and co-heir of Charles Lord Lucas, of Shenfield (Lord Lucas died in 1688, and was succeeded by his brother Thomas, at whose death the peerage became extinct). Paul Methuen, of Corsham, was succeeded by his son, Paul Cobb Methuen, for some time member of Parliament for Great Bedwin, and married to Matilda, daughter of Sir Thomas Gooch, of Benacre. He died in September, 1816, and was succeeded by his eldest son, afterwards the first Lord Methuen, and on whose son (the present Peer) has devolved the representation of the above Charles Lord Lucas.

It is but rarely that a member of either House has the courage, in a maiden speech, to read a lecture to his audience. Lord Methuen did so, and did it ably. In a country enjoying such liberty of speech as England does, the public platform should never be used to pander to the passions of the multitude, and set class against class. It is not possible to overrate the importance of public speech as a mode of popular instruction; and it should, therefore, be so earnestly and temperately used, that the nobler powers of men, and not their angry passions, shall be called into activity. There is no need for either party, in any question of human right or progress, to thunder invectives against those who advocate it, or who stand in the way or lag behind. There may be enthusiasm without anger, and strong enforcement of facts and opposing opinions without vituperative charges of motives and angry misrepresentations of the efforts and intentions of opponents.

CONDITION OF IRELAND.

(Concluded from page 51.)

I intended my last communication to be the conclusion, but, on looking over my portfolio, I find another Sketch or two—one of which, at least, you may think worthy of being published. The village of Killard forms part of the Union of Kilrush, and possesses an area of 17,022 acres. It had a population, in 1841, of 6850 souls, and was valued to the Poor-rate at £4254. It is chiefly the property, I understand, of Mr. John MacMahon Blackall, whose healthy residence is admirably situated on the brow of a hill, protected by another ridge from the storms of the Atlantic. His roof-tree yet stands secure, but the people have disappeared. The village was mostly inhabited by fishermen, who united with their occupation on the waters the cultivation of potatoes. When the latter failed, it might have been expected that the former should have been pursued with more vigour than ever; but boats and lines were sold for present subsistence, and to the failure of the potatoes was added the abandonment of the fisheries. The rent dwindled to nothing, and then came the leveller and the exterminator. What has become of the 6850 souls, I know not; but not ten houses remain of the whole village to inform the wayfarer where, according to the population returns, they were to be found in 1841. They were here, but are gone for ever; and all that remains of their abodes are a few mouldering walls, and piles of offensive thatch turning into manure. Killard is an epitome of half Ireland. If the abodes of the people had not been so slight, that they have mingled, like Babylon, with their original clay, Ireland would for ages be renowned for its ruins; but, as it is, the houses are swept away like the people, and not a monument remains of a multitude, which, in ancient Asia or in the wilds of America, would numerically constitute a great nation.

May I, in conclusion, remind your readers that the class of men in whose name, by whose bidding, and for whose supposed advantage all this ruin has been wrought, are still blindly treading in the same path. They are even now taking counsel together, to compel the wretched beings left on the land to seek the means of subsistence from the soil they monopolise. Their hope is, to keep up rent; the effect of their wishes, were they embodied into a law, would be to continue extirpation. A fall of price, and a decay of rent—the necessary consequences of suspending labour and getting rid of consumers—have lessened their incomes, and to gross ignorance of the effects of legislation, are now added decay and anger. It is estimated that the value of property rateable to the poor has fallen from upwards of £18,000,000 to less than £9,000,000 in three years, while all the obligations of the landowners are undiminished, and, in many cases, increased. Some great proprietors have been already sold up; and many of those who escape that desecration will only retain nominal possession of their domains. Under such circumstances it may be expected that the landowners will struggle desperately, but they will struggle in vain; for, in extirpating the people, instead of aiding and encouraging their exertions, they have snapped the sinews of their own strength.

But I must leave this painful subject. The worst, it may be hoped, is passed. Though legislation can only help the people by undoing its work, and setting them free, it is not in human nature to perish without a struggle. The land is still here, all the elements of wealth are still in existence; public attention is intensely directed to social phenomena; opportunities of improvement, as they arise, will be embraced; and landlords, farmers, peasants, and priests will each do something to help themselves, and will promote the prosperity of all.

The late dreadful lesson has given them dear-bought knowledge; suffering has made it a part of their existence, and they cannot get rid of it if they would. For those who have outlived famine, and legislation more desolating than famine, brighter prospects are dawning, but they can only be secured and enjoyed by their own exertions. To grow in prosperity, the Irish must not be continually deterred by a false reliance on those who have hitherto deluded them, and who are even now claiming all the credit of the improvement that is for ever springing from the struggles of individuals to better their condition.

GREAT FIRE IN GUILDFORD-STREET, BELVIDERE-ROAD.

DESTRUCTIVE CONFLAGRATION IN LAMBETH.

On Thursday morning, shortly before one o'clock, a fire broke out in the extensive premises belonging to Mr. George Myers, of the Ordnance Wharf, Belvidere-road, which, in the extent of its ravages, has exceeded any catastrophe of the kind with which the metropolis has been visited for many years past.

The Belvidere-road is the well-known thoroughfare extending along the South-wark side of the river Thames; and Guildford-street, where the catastrophe occurred, forms a communication between it and the York-road. Both sides of Guildford-street are occupied by extensive manufactories, erected some years since by Messrs Grissell and Peto. One of them, that on the east side of the street, having been occupied for a long period by that firm, and that on the opposite side having been built for Messrs. Christopher Nickels and Company, patent India-rubber web manufacturers, whose freehold the property remains. Mr. Myers, who is an eminent builder and con-tractor, in addition to the Ordnance Wharf, occupied a very large extent of premi-es in the rear of Messrs. Nickels's works, having entrances on either side of the latter from Guildford-street. These premises were bounded on the south by the rear of the houses in the York-road; on the north by some small tene-ments in the Belvidere-road; and on the west by Messrs. Cossers's timber-yard. The fire is supposed to have originated in the north-west corner of Mr. Myers's works—it is generally believed in the blacksmiths' shop—but nothing certain is known on the subject.

The first engines to reach the spot were those of the West of England Fire Office and the Waterloo station of the Brigade Establishment, the officers attached to which lost no time in getting to work. The fire at this period, however, was so difficult to reach that the water thrown in the direction from whence the flames issued had no useful effect, and the conflagration continued to spread with frightful rapidity.

It soon became evident that no salvage could be effected on Mr. Myers's premises; but, in consequence of the very strong party-wall separating Messrs. Nickels's warehouses, it was at first hoped that the former esta-blishment might have been saved. A brisk north-westerly wind, how-ever, fanned the flames in this direction with fatal effect, and within half an hour after the outbreak the fire burst through the roof of this building (re-presented in our Illustra-tion), and shot up into the air in sheets of flame, which rose upwards of twenty feet above the summit of the walls, illu-minating the whole metro-polis and its environs for miles around. Messrs. Nickels's warehouse con-tained a very large quan-tity of valuable machinery, as well as an expensively manufactured stock of India-rubber webs—the whole of which was de-stroyed.

After Messrs. Nickels's factory had ignited, it be-came evident, from the intense heat thrown out by the flames (at this time extending over very nearly half an acre of ground), that the houses in York-road and Belvi-dere-road abutting upon Mr. Myers's yard would be sacrificed in the general wreck, and in a very short period the win-dow casements in the rear of eight houses in the York-road were on fire at the same mo-ment. Great exertions were made to save this property, but com-paratively without avail, five houses having been completely gutted. The tenements in the Belvi-dere-road suffered very much, but not in the same degree, the wind setting in from that quarter, and driving the flames in an opposite direction. Some conception of the degree of heat thrown out by the flames may be gathered from the fact that blocks of solid Portland-stone lying in the yard, of several tons weight each, have been crumbled to fragments, and converted into lime by the action of the fire.

There seems to have been no person on the spot, for some time after the outbreak, at all fa-miliar with Mr. Myers's premises, in consequence of which, four valuable horses, contained in one of the stables, were burnt to death. The quantity of timber in log and plank destroyed is something enormous; but the chief loss, we believe, will arise from the entire destruction of some valuable carved stone-work executed for ecclesiastical structures, for which Mr. Myers is the contractor, under Mr. Pugin, the eminent architect.

The following is an abstract of the official report of the damage, rendered by Mr. Braidwood the chief superintendent of the brigade force to the several insurance offices:—

PEDLAR'S ACRE.

Mr. G. Myers's building and timber-yard.—Offices, saw-mills, workshops, and stables, with their contents (including four horses), wholly destroyed. Insured in the West of England and Phœnix fire-offices.

Messrs. Walter Cosser and Son, timber merchants.—Premises injured by fire, and stock damaged. Insured in the Phœnix Fire-office.

GUILDFORD-STREET

Messrs. Christopher Nickels and Co., patent India-rubber web manufacturers.—Warehouse and manufactory burnt down, and contents wholly destroyed. In-sured in the London and other offices

Mr. Grissell's premises on the opposite side of this street, at present unoccu-pied, are damaged by fire and water, the parapet of the building being burnt, and the front much scorched.

YORK-ROAD

No. 2 Mr. James Heath, livery-stable keeper. Stock and furniture slightly injured by removal.

Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6—Similarly damaged.

Nos. 7 and 8 —Occupied jointly by Mr. Miskin, surgeon.—The back front very much burnt, and roof and window-frames destroyed. Furniture damaged by fire and water. Insured in the Sun Office.

No. 9 —Mr. Brownsmith. The back windows and roof wholly destroyed, and the house very much injured by fire and water. Insured in the Sun Office.

No. 10 —Mr. Miller. This house has sustained precisely similar injury to the last. The occupant is uninsured.

No. 11 Mr. Hartley. Similar injury, and also uninsured.

No. 12—Mr. R Wardle, superintendent of Messrs. Grissell's workmen at the New Houses of Parliament. Similar injury. Insured in the Norwich Union Office.

No. 13—Mr. Dawson, surgeon. The back front of this house, which forms the corner of Guildford-street, is only slightly burnt, but the furniture has been much injured by the water.

BELVIDERE-ROAD.

No. 2—Mr. Hutchinson. The back front much burnt, and window-frames de-stroyed. Insured in the County Office.

No. 3—Mr. Swanaden. This house has sustained similar damage. Uninsured.

No. 4—Mr. Harris. Similar injury. Uninsured.

No. 5—Mr. Glanvil, house-agent. Similar injury. Uninsured.

No. 6—Mr. Farsweather. Similar injury. Uninsured.

THE FIRE-BRIGADE.

The Abbe Matelène, who was arrested at Paris lately on a charge o being connected with the affair of the Rue Rumfort, and of forming part of the secret society called the Légion de St. Hubert, has been set at liberty by a decree of the Chambre du Conseil.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Advices just received from the various States of South America state that the Republic of Bolivia was threatened with new disturbances. In the capital and other places insurrections had occurred. An earthquake had occurred at Coquimbo on the 20th November, which did considerable damage to property.

From Chili we learn that on the 30th of November news had been received in Valparaiso of the rising of the Indians in the south, menacing Valdivia and the adjacent provinces. Serious difficulties were apprehended, and the Chilian Government had ordered troops to proceed to the south to put down the insurrection, if possible. At Valparaiso itself importations from all quarters of the world were pouring in, on a scale entirely disproportioned to the wants of the market.

Accounts from Egypt to January 21st, state that Abbas Pasha, the Viceroy, seems intent upon removing from Egypt all those who have been in any way connected with his predecessors, and forming creatures of his own; and thus the Porte gains its own ends by weakening the power of Egypt and reducing it to a level with any other pashalic in the Ottoman empire.

Sheriff Pasha, one of the few remaining men of parts and character at Alexandria, has left Egypt for Constantinople, and expects to be appointed Governor of Damascus.

It has been finally decided by the Board of Health at Alexandria, that henceforward the term of quarantine between Egypt and Syria is to be reduced to five days, including the days of arrival and departure, thus making it only three whole days.

The total value of exports from Egypt to all parts during the year 1849 amounted to £1,650,561 sterling, and imports from all parts to £1,474,000 sterling. Of these Great Britain had, as usual, by far the greater proportion—the exports to England amounting to half the whole value, or £807,953; the imports from England amounting to £607,408.

At new Orleans another crevasse or split in the Mississippi Dyke has occurred at Iona Plantation, on the south of St. John the Baptist.

Margaret Lennox, alias Hamilton, suffered the last penalty of the law for the crimes of forgery and murder, on Thursday morning week, in front of the Court-house, at Glasgow. Strenuous efforts had been made by a number of ladies and other persons to obtain a commutation of the sentence, but their efforts were in vain. The deceased was in the 25th year of her age; she had been married two years, and has left an infant six months old.

An official notice in the Paris Moniteur complains of the immense number of applicants to the Ministry of Finance for employment or promotion, which it states to be so great as to preclude the possibility of all the demands receiving proper attention. No candidate for employment by the Administration will in future be attended to, unless his name has been sent through the admi-trative authorities of the department in which he resides.

Within the past week an authentic legal announcement has been made to Thomas Strade Kendal, carpet-weaver, living in Caroline-street, Kendal, that he is heir-at-law to the estates of Miss Burns, at Cringlemire, near South, who died recently at Cheltenham. The value of the real estate is stated at £14,000. The fortunate successor to this property has hitherto been in poor circumstances.

Those who visit the country, and inquire into its state, say they can see no means of remedying the distress in that portion of it.

The American line of packet ship Prince Albert, just arrived in the docks from New York, has brought three packages of cotton seed consigned to order. Although the importations of cotton in a raw state from the United States are of so numerous and extensive a character, the importation of the seed is not of common occurrence; and, for whatever purpose the present arrival of the article may have been taken place, it is of interest.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

CLERGY ORPHAN CORPORATION.—On Saturday afternoon the hundredth annual general meeting of this society was held at the Freemasons' Tavern. The object of this society is to maintain and educate the orphans of poor clergymen until they are capable of providing for themselves. The Right Hon. the Bishop of London took the chair. From the financial statement, it appeared that the income of the society for the past year, from all sources, only amounted to £4600, while the expenditure for the same period was £5300, leaving a balance against the society of £700. On the motion of Sir R. H. Inglis, the Right Rev. the Bishop of London was re-elected president for the ensuing year. In returning thanks, the rev. prelate took occasion to deplore that, after having been for so many years connected with the society, he should see the claims upon its benevolence increasing, and the means of meeting those claims so rapidly diminishing. While the present improvements were going on in the Church, by dividing large parishes into small cures, there was every probability of increased demands upon the society for the past years, from all sources, of amounted to £4600, while the expenditure for the same period was £5300, leaving a balance against the society of £700. On the motion of Sir R. H. Inglis, the Right Rev. the Bishop of London was re-elected president for the ensuing year. In returning thanks, the rev. prelate took occasion to deplore that, after having been for so many years connected with the society, he should see the claims upon its benevolence increasing, and the means of meeting those claims so rapidly diminishing. While the present improvements were going on in the Church, by dividing large parishes into small cures, there was every probability of increased demands upon the society for the past years, from all sources, orphans. The clergy themselves, upon whom so many of the daily calls had done all in their power to support the society, and so had many of the laity; but he was sure, that, if the public at large were made acquainted with the objects and present condition of the institution, many would be found able and willing to aid their funds by pecuniary assistance. On the motion of Archdeacon Jones, Sir R. H. Inglis was re-elected vice-president, after which five boys and eight girls were elected into the schools of the society at St. Johnswood, making the number at present in that establishment amount to 183—namely, 76 girls, and 77 boys.

ROYAL INSTITUTE OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.—At the usual meeting of this institution, on Monday night—Mr. Sidney Smirke, vice-president, in the chair—the Royal gold medal, placed at the disposal of the Institute, by her Majesty, as an honorary distinction to be conferred annually upon architects of eminence of any country, was unanimously awarded to Mr. Charles Barry, a fellow of the Institute, for having designed and executed various works of high merit. For the Soane Medallion there were six competitors, only one of whom approached in any degree the standard of excellence which an institution like this had a right to expect. The design thus preferred was inscribed, "Faith, Hope, and Charity;" but, notwithstanding the "hope" and the "faith" of the artist, the council thought it so full of serious defects as to withhold the medal. The silver prize was awarded to the author of the most satisfactory paper on "The life, the genius, and the works of Giacomo Barozzi da Vignola," a great Italian architect of the sixteenth century. A large number of valuable drawings of the chief works of Vignola, many of which were furnished by Professor Donaldson, Mr. Falkener, and other Associates, were exhibited in the room of meeting. After the conclusion of the paper, an animated discussion ensued, in which Professor Cockerell, Mr. Tite, Mr. Bellamy, and the chairman took part, upon the disadvantages which the system of competition, as at present conducted, presents to young architects, which, in their opinion, was not at all compensated for by the new more fashionable devotion of their energies to mediæval works. A vote of thanks was passed by acclamation to Mr. Angell, and the meeting adjourned.

AGED POOR SOCIETY.—The anniversary festival of this society, which was instituted about 150 years since, to assist by pensions the poor of the Roman Catholic faith, was held on Monday evening at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street, the Right Reverend Dr. Wiseman presiding. A report, which was circulated among the company—about seventy gentlemen sitting down to a very comfortable dinner—stated that the past year had not realised the cheering prospects which they had anticipated at the commencement, the income of the year not having been sufficient to meet the expenditure; and, as a necessary consequence had been compelled to allow another Christmas to pass without placing any additional pensioners upon the list. When the last balance-sheet was presented to the subscribers, there was a deficit of nearly £60, to meet which a special collection was made for £360 stock from the almshouse fund, to be replaced before any additional names were placed on the pension list—the directors, in the meantime, paying three per cent. instead of five per cent. to the bankers. By these means the accounts were made to show a small balance in favour of the society, and the directors trusted to the increased support of their Roman Catholic brethren, and some fortuitous circumstances, to get them out of the difficulty in which they were placed. Six pensioners and one annuitant had died during the year, and from the circumstances above detailed the vacancies thus created had not been filled up. The directors hoped shortly to be able to announce the purchase of a piece of land, on which to erect the long-wished-for and sufficient funds for the purpose, the amount in hand being £2706 16s. 3d. The balance-sheet showed that for the general purposes of the charity the amount received during the past year (including £461 8s., the proceeds of the almshouse stock) was £1106 19s., while the expenditure (including the balance against the society last year of £138 3s. 11d.) £1102 7s. 10d., leaving a balance in hand of £4 [illegible] An [illegible] eloquent sermon was preached, on Sunday, by the Rev. Mr. Kenrick in Carbonaro chapel, Aldersgate-street, to be devoted chiefly to the use of the poorer inhabitants, and after which the sum of £70 was collected in the room, which amounted to about £170, of which £15 15s. were subscribed in aid of the almshouse fund. Among the principal subscriptions we observed—Y. Z., by the secretary, £30; the Right Hon. Lord Arundell, £20; Mr. Ignatius Bonaparte, £10; Mr. Pegg, £5; Dr. Morris, £3 3s.; Mr. Dixon, £3 3s., &c. The pleasures of the evening were much enhanced by the musical talents of Messrs. Kenny, Sowerbutty, Lee, and Moody.

METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY.—On Monday a lecture was delivered by Mr. John Lauda Tabberner, at Willis's Rooms, King-street, St. James's-square, on the best means of supply of water to the metropolis by means of Artesian wells and other modes now before the public, pointing out, upon the necessity, on the ground of efficiency and economy, of placing the general water supply, as public property, together with the other departments of our sanitary system, under the management of one responsible head or direction. Having at some length explained to a numerous assembly the nature and the properties of the soil on which London is built, the lecturer strongly urged the benefits he had witnessed in the plan of drawing water from wells—namely instead of the sandy formation, whereby from thirty to fifty million gallons of water per diem could be procured by establishing twelve hundred miles of piping of seven-inch bore, allowing a square of each piping to send forth, so to say, arranged that if any accident occurred in one, they could easily supply the deficiency from any of the others. The arguments of the lecturer chiefly went to prove, that in the metropolis there existed no scarcity of water, which he could not exist in the sand, inasmuch as it had been found that wherever water was obtained from sand it rapidly diminished in quantity, whereas in the other case they had only to increase the flow of water that they discovered no reduction. All the statements that had been made as to the unwholesomeness of the water obtained from chalk, and that it contained chalybeous matter were thoroughly refounded. He further elucidated, with the assistance of carefully prepared diagrams, the artesian system, now applied to the great water-bearing stratum of chalk under and around London, and stated in conclusion that his object was to take the water supply out of the hands of private companies and place it where it originally was, in the hands of the people, to whom it belonged as a primitive right. For that purpose he had made a general proposition for placing, by act of Parliament, the future control of the whole water supply as public property under a consolidated management, to be paid for by the present purveyors of each district. For that end it would be necessary that they should start with a capital of £2,611,000 to purchase the right which the existing companies held; a few years would be required for the working of this system, and he pledged himself that in a few years, by making the water supply subservient to the rating, and instituting a rate of 2½d. instead of the present water-rate of 10d., there would be a saving of £300,000 per annum to London. The lecturer answered many questions put by the scientific gentlemen present in a satisfactory manner, and his observations met with much applause.

METROPOLITAN SANITARY ASSOCIATION.—A numerously attended meeting of the Metropolitan Sanitary Association, and others interested in the sanitary improvements of the metropolis, was held on Tuesday evening at the Freemasons' Tavern, the Bishop of London in the chair. The Bishop of Chichester proposed the first resolution:

That, with the exception of the City of London, containing only 125,000 inhabitants, this metropolis, with more than 2,000,000 of souls, forming a large proportion of the town population of England, is destitute of any adequate provision or effective organization whereby the comfort, health, and lives of the people can be watched over and protected. That notwithstanding numerous efforts made to the metropolitan districts to procure a sanitary enactment mainly contributed to the passing of the Nuisances Removal Act, yet those districts are the only parts excluded from the benefits of that enactment. This exclusion has led to much misery and a great sacrifice of life. That it is the opinion of this meeting, therefore, it is expedient that a comprehensive bill be forthwith introduced into Parliament, to remedy the grievous evils which afflict and oppress the inhabitants generally, but more particularly the working classes of this vast metropolis.

Lord Ashley seconded the resolution, which was carried nem. con. Lord R. Grosvenor moved the second resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Wylde, and carried:—

That the reports of the medical superintending inspectors employed during the late visitation have brought to light facts which fall most heavily on the labouring population, who are least able to sustain and totally unable to remove the causes of disease, and that it is expedient to call at the same time demanding the most prompt, energetic, and carefully-devised means of relief.

The Rev. Dr. Cumming proposed the third resolution:—

That in the metropolis the late epidemic destroyed 18,000 persons, of which number it is not stated nor can it be known how many would have perished under the pressure of previously adopted been simply resorted to; and that more than 18,000 persons annually perish from disease, whose lives might, under the Divine blessing, be preserved by sanitary precautions. That this great sacrifice of human life is accompanied by an amount of physical degradation and mental depravity, which are an effective barriers to the inculcation either of social obligations or of Car stian virtues.

Mr. Charles Dickens, who seconded the resolution, was received with loud and continued applause. The following are the remaining resolutions:—

That the total want of efficient machinery wherewith to meet the recurrent ravages of cholera and the constant devastations of typhus and other epidemic diseases induced by the state of the dwellings of the poor and of their surroundings, by the defective water supply and drainage, by the overcrowding of houses, by the imperfect, perfect, and [illegible] and by the non removal of refuse, and by the prevalence of nuisances and of offensive and noxious trades and manufactures, imperatively calls for legislative interference

That an association, termed "The Metropolitan Sanitary Association," having been formed for the purpose of obtaining a sanitary act for the metropolis adequate to its requirements, and for the adoption of such other measures as may be deemed advisable to improve the social condition of the labouring classes, the following gentlemen and gentlemen be appointed to act as officers [illegible]

A petition to the Legislature, founded on the foregoing resolutions, was adopted.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' SCHOOL.—The board of management of this institution held their usual monthly meeting on Tuesday. After the ordinary business was disposed of, the deputation which had been appointed to proceed to Bristol for the purpose of promoting the raising of the building fund, were called upon to report the result of their visit. The secretary stated that the deputation, on their arrival in Bristol, had been introduced to the principal bankers, merchants, and commercial houses in the city. A public dinner was proposed, and the deputation waited upon the Mayor, to request him to preside on the occasion, and, with characteristic urbanity and kindness, his worship immediately consented. Before the deputation left Bristol, the members of a local committee was formed. The secretary went on to state, that since the deputation had left Bristol, several communications had been received, from which it appeared that a meeting of merchants and others was held on Thursday week, J. G. Shaw, Esq., in the chair, when resolutions were passed, in which a confident hope was expressed that Bristol would second the general effort making for the attainment of the objects of the charity. A committee was also appointed to aid in exciting public sympathy, and it was resolved that the inhabitants of the city should be invited to attend a dinner of the supporters of the institution, on February 21, at the White Lion. The secretary proceeded to state that the local committee had commenced an active canvass for donations, and that upwards of £400 had already been obtained. The utmost satisfaction was expressed at the manner in which the deputation had been received in Bristol, and with the progress of the Bristol fund. Votes of thanks were passed to the Mayor of Bristol, and to the principal supporters of the institution in that city. A deputation was also appointed to attend the dinner to be held at Bristol on the 21st inst.

HOUSE OF CHARITY.—A numerously attended meeting of Associates and friends of this institution was held on Tuesday evening, at the Rooms, 9, Rose-street, Soho, the object of which was to make known, and especially to the parochial clergy, the various forms of relief which the means afforded by it for the temporary relief of the deserving poor. The attendance of both of ladies and gentlemen was numerous. Amongst those present were Lord and Lady Castlereagh, Sir George Prevost, Bart.; Hon. Gilbert Talbot, and the Rev. J. Armstrong, Vicar of Tideneham. After a few words of introduction, Lieutenant-Colonel Sheil, the honorary secretary, the Rev. G. C. White, the warden, who occupied the chair, explained at length the objects of the institution, which were:—1. To afford temporary relief to the poor of the metropolis, carefully selected. 2. To enable persons whose time is much occupied by professions or other active duties, as well as those who have more leisure, to co-operate in works of charity without the trouble of personal inquiry. Experience had convinced the first of these heads, that the help of the charity might be given under the following circumstances:—1. To patients discharged from hospitals, and out-patients unable to do full work, through the debility of the body, and unable to obtain either without assistance. 2. Persons dependent on those who, by accident or sudden disease, have been taken into hospitals. 3. Persons suddenly, and by no fault of their own, thrown out of work, as in the case of a fire, or the bankruptcy or death of an employer, and who are in immediate search of friends or of employment, and are not successful in their object. 5. Persons, especially females, whose health requires a short respite from laborious work, though they cannot afford to take the expense of a visit to the country. 6. Persons having no friends in London, and wanting either for the means or the opportunity to emigrate. 7. Persons for whom an asylum is desired, in which they [illegible] a probationary discipline previous to their admission towards recovering a position which they have lost by misconduct. The great majority of cases eligible would, he believed, fall under one or other of these heads. With regard to admission, the council were at all times ready to receive the recommendations of district visitors, medical men, officers of public charities, and above all of the parochial clergy, whose co-operation was regarded as an essential element of the success of the charity. The persons admitted were required to have prospects of employment on leaving the house, as it must be borne in mind that the asylum offered was only a temporary one, and that unless permanent good were to follow, it would be almost thrown away. The council also preferred to be made acquainted with the previous character of applicants. Inmates were ordinarily admitted for one month, but in special cases requiring it, the time might be prolonged. The relief given consisted of food and lodging, and other needful temporal assistance, accompanied with spiritual counsel and comfort, and such offices of personal kindness, advice, and instruction as each individual case might require. Since the opening of the house in January, 1847, to the 1st January, 1850, there had been admitted 269 persons, more than 16 families and 34 children. Of these, the greater part on leaving the house have obtained employment. Some have been sent home to their friends or parishes in the country, others have emigrated, and others transferred to the hospitals, including, with those in London, the Bath Hospital and the Infirmary at Margate. Some few have been discharged for misconduct or irregularity; and many have been assisted to emigrate to the British Colonies, aided by funds of money and clothing, raised through the kindness of friends. In most cases by a "free" or "assisted" passage, obtained from her Majesty's Emigration Commissioners. The Rev. Nugent Wade, Lord Castlereagh, and several other gentlemen addressed the meeting, which broke up.

NEW CHURCH IN ST. MARYLEBONE PARISH.—On Tuesday, a numerous meeting of ladies and gentlemen residing in the district of Christ Church, May-fair, took place in the vestry-room, Hanover-street, for the purpose of promoting the erection and endowment of a new church in Carlisle-street, Portman-market, to be devoted chiefly to the use of the poorer inhabitants, and which, when erected, is to be called St. Augustine's. The sum required for the erection of the church is to be £9,000, of which one-half is to be expended on the building, and the other on the endowment of the church. Resolutions in accordance with the object of the meeting were unanimously adopted. Lord Arundell, of Wardour, was in the chair on occasion.

EQUALISATION OF THE LAND-TAX.—On Wednesday, at one o'clock, a deputation of gentlemen, comprising delegates from several metropolitan parishes, waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by appointment, at his official residence in Downing-street, with the view of urging upon the consideration of the Government a more equable arrangement of the above impost. The deputation, which was introduced by Sir Benjamin Hall, M.P., Lord Lyndhurst, the members for Westminster, was composed of delegates from the following districts:—The Liberty of the Rolls; St. Paul's, Covent-Garden; St. Andrew's, Holborn; St. Clement Danes; St. Mary-le-Strand; St. James's, Clerkenwell; Christchurch, Newgate-street; St. Saviour's, Southwark; and St. Stephen's, Walbrook. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was accompanied by Mr. John Wood, the chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, Mr. Miller, of the Chancery bar, acted as the spokesman of the deputation, and showed the excessive inequality of the present tax, and urged, that, if no general equalisation could be brought forward, the Government ought at least to remedy the present defective state of the law with regard to the mode of assessing the tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply, said, that as the general equalisation of the land-tax, that was too large a question for him to pronounce an opinion upon, particularly after the manner in which the tax had been dealt with at the time the Redemption Acts were passed. Mr. Pitt having treated the quotas then fixed as perpetual, because the Government would make no further purchases, and as to the partial relief sought, it did not appear to him that the party who appeared in the Holborn division had executed all the remedies given him by the act, and he considered there was valid reason why relief should not be given to towns under that head been done. In Lord Aylesford's case, referred to in Mr. Wood's evidence before the agricultural committee in 1830, it was laid down that if the commissioners did not meet the application to make an equal rate, a power was given to apply to the Court of Exchequer in order to compel them to do so. Mr. Miller said that with regard to the remedy suggested by the Chancellor against the commissioners, the point had been considered by the most eminent counsel, all of whom were of opinion that the decision of the commissioners was final, and that the parties appealing were without remedy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made no further observation on the subject; and the deputation, after a few complimentary words, left the room, retired from his presence.

SUPPLY OF WATER TO THE METROPOLIS.—A meeting of the inhabitants of Camden and Kentish Towns took place on Thursday evening, at the Victoria Tavern, Kentish Town, for the purpose of considering the best means of securing an abundant supply of pure water, at the cheapest rate, Mr. Morrow Timpson in the chair. After a long discussion on the necessity for such a supply, and explanations from Mr. Chamberland (the Secretary) and Mr. Paton, the promoter of the London (Watford) Spring-water Company, resolutions to the following effect were carried:—That it is the opinion of this meeting that the present supply of water is impure in quality, insufficient in quantity, and exorbitant in price, and that this meeting approves the proposals of the London (Watford) Spring-water Company, this meeting is of opinion that they are deserving their support. A Petition to Parliament in favour of the company was then read and signed; and after a vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.

MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL.—A quarterly court of the governors of this institution was held on Thursday at the Hospital, Sir R. H. Inglis in the chair. It appeared from the balance-sheet for the quarter ending Lady-day, that the income for the year had been £8818, which was an excess over the receipts of £3638. The chairman then proceeded to read a list of legacies, and stated that, if they had all proved good, this charity would not be in the state it was at the present time. The number of patients in the house during the last year was two hundred and fifty; and of the out-patients, nine hundred. The balance-sheet was then produced, and signed; and after a vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.

ALIENATED TITHES.—The board of the Tithe Redemption Trust, on Wednesday, held their quarterly meeting, at their offices, No. 1, Lancaster-place, Waterloo-bridge, in the absence of Lord John Manners, Francis E. Wegg Prosser, Esq., M.P., was in the chair. The meeting was numerously attended, and much interesting matter relating to many pressing cases was brought under their notice, evincing that nothing but pecuniary aid is required to accomplish an important work on behalf of the Church. It is impossible to refrain from deeply sympathising with the numbers of the parochial clergy whose cause, on account of the inadequacy of their incomes to meet, has in various claims upon them, this society is advocating; and it was determined that more extensive measures should forthwith be adopted to bring its claims before the public during the ensuing year.

TAMAR SILVER LEAD MINING COMPANY.—A special meeting of this company was held at the offices, Salvador House, Bishopsgate-street, on Thursday, P. N. Johnson, Esq., F.R.S., in the chair; when a statement was laid before the proprietors that there was an available profit in hand of £2367 [illegible] for the last half year; but that the directors considered it advisable to retain from the capital in hand £500 to extend [illegible] and [illegible] and to purchase and erect one of an improved description, as they had hitherto erected by Pattison's patent process, whereby only 1 per cent. would be lost instead of 9, and render that profitable which under the old process would not be worth crushing. After some discussion, it was resolved that the payment of dividends should be stopped until the required capital was raised, when it should be entered upon the scrip as an additional call paid up. By this operation, the payment of dividends, which for the last three years and a half have been at the rate of 10 per cent., will be deferred for about twelve months.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANK.—The annual meeting of the proprietors of this bank was held at the London Tavern on Thursday, John Sadler, Esq., M.P., in the chair. A report was read to the meeting which stated that the net profits for the half-year ending the 31st December, 1849, amounted to £8745 7s. 8d. The directors recommended the payment of a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent per annum for the half-year, which would leave £2735 7s. 8d. to be carried to the guarantee fund, which would be thereby increased to £11,115 17s. 2d. The directors during the year had taken the business of Messrs. Trapp and Co., of Bedford; opened a branch at Knightsbridge, and at Epsom, in connexion with the Croydon branch. The report was adopted, the dividend declared, and votes of thanks given to the chairman, the other directors, and officers; after which the meeting separated.

THE TRADES OF LABOUR.—A public meeting was held on Thursday night at the Mechanics' Institution, Southampton buildings, for the purpose of considering the ruinous principles of competition, and for establishing a system of regulation for all branches of industrial employment. Mr. Lovett was in the chair. After considerable discussion, a resolution was passed to the effect, that as labour was the source of all wealth, it evidently followed that the prosperity and independence of Great Britain and her colonies would be best promoted by employing and protecting the greatest numbers of a healthy, industrious, intelligent, and moral population, which could be educated and comfortably maintained by their own industry; and therefore it was the first and most important duty of the British Legislature and Queen's Government to adopt such measures as would best secure employment to every one of the population, and for their labour an abundance of the necessaries and comforts of life. A vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the business of the evening.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.—A very important meeting was held at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Thursday, the Hon. Chetwynd Talbot, M.P., in the chair; which was addressed by the Bishops of Glasgow and Chichester, Earl Nelson, Archdeacon Manning, Viscount Fielding, Mr. Nugent, M.P., Mr. Palmer, M.P., and other influential gentlemen; when resolutions were carried to the effect that the Committee of Education having, in their capacity, no definite creed, but encouraging the teaching of such conflicting forms of belief, was rapidly assuming the attitude, and engrossing the functions of a legislative body of public instruction, at variance with the principles of the Constitution, and rendering the apprehensions which were expressed in Convocation in 1839 by our ancient Prelates and laymen of the Church; that, notwithstanding the resolutions adopted by the House of Lords in 1839, and the remonstrances on the part of the Church Society, the Committee of Council have persistently been making fresh aggressions, and had thus impaired the energies and obstructed the Church in the discharge of her functions in educating the people; that the apprehensions expressed of the tendencies of the new system were confirmed by the establishment of a normal school at Kneller Hall, and the expenditure of £30,000 of public money without previous Parliamentary sanction; and that it had been the necessary result of the refusal of Government to remove the impediments which precluded many Church schools from receiving public money voted by Parliament, and of aiding the Church in educating the people on her own principles. An address to the Queen, and petitions to Parliament, founded on the resolutions of which the above is an abstract, were unanimously adopted; and, after a vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.

THE LOCK HOSPITAL AND ASYLUM.—The anniversary dinner of this institution was held at the London Tavern on Wednesday evening. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who was supported by a numerous and influential body of gentlemen, presided upon the occasion. The usual toasts then removed, and the usual preliminary toasts having been drunk, the noble chairman then proposed "Success to the Lock Hospital," and the secretary proceeded to read the report, from which it appears that "the number of patients who have received care during the year at the hospital amounts to 791 (714 in patients), making an aggregate, from the first opening of the institution, in 1747, of 88,456 patients who have been cured. In proof of the high medical skill, as well as the zeal and ability of the staff of the establishment, the report stated, with deep gratitude, that, during the past year—memorable for its almost unparalleled mortality—only one death has occurred within the walls, and this from an accidental cause, which could not have been anticipated. That the future prospects of the charity have at last assumed a somewhat more hopeful aspect. It is true that the receipts of the year have fallen short of the expenditure by nearly £900; yet, when it is stated that the subscription of former years have not been reduced upon that which stood against the hospital a year ago by about £400, the governors consider that the clouds which have so long hung over this house are beginning to break away. The regular income of the hospital is now almost adequate to its current expenses; when therefore this debt is removed, as it is hoped it may be by the proceeds of the approaching anniversary dinner, the governors will be able to carry out the plans anticipated. That the financial buildings, according to the original plan, by the erection of another wing on the eastern side of the institution for the reception of additional patients. The addition to the wing is the more necessary, as persons to endure the cold, and vegetables in general suffered prodigiously. But on the 14th of January, 1780, the mercury was 20 degrees below the freezing point" The Gateshead Observer adds, that in the year 1740 Ravensworth Castle was for a month or two, in 1800 the Thames was frozen nine weeks; in 1291 most of our rivers were frozen six weeks; in 359 Scotland had 14 weeks of frost; in 908 the rivers of Britain were frozen up above two months; in 695 the Thames was frozen six weeks, and another in 1716 for a like time; a frost began which endured from Oct. 1 to Feb. 25; in 827 a nine weeks' frost; in 859 and 860 the Adriatic and Mediterranean were frozen over; in 908 most of the English rivers were frost-bound; 923, 987, and 998, frosts set in which lasted for many weeks; on Midsummer day, 1035, grain and fruit were destroyed by frost; 1063, 1076, 1114, 1205, 1207, 1234, 1241, 1295, 1306, 1323, 1340, 1402, 1408, 1423, 1426, 1506, 1420, 1434, were also periods of severe frost; in 1740 the Thames was frozen nine weeks; in 1291 most of our rivers were frozen six weeks; in 359 Scotland had 14 weeks of frost; in 908 the rivers of Britain were frozen up above two months; in 695 the Thames was frozen six weeks,

FÊTE OF LIGHTS, ON THE BOULEVARD ST. MARTIN, AT PARIS.—(SEE PAGE 82.)

VISIT OF RARE WINTER BIRDS TO ENGLAND.

We find in a statement of the Doncaster Gazette the following record of the late severe and long-continued frost having brought to our shores some very rare visitants to the British Isles. Their presence may be deemed a sure indication of the severity of the season in far-off regions. Among-t those now in the possession of Mr Hugh Reed, for preservation, are specimens of the Black-throated Diver (Colymbus arcticus), one of our rarer winter visitors; the Red-throated Diver (C. septentrionalis); the Sclavonian Grebe (Podiceps cornutus); the Red-breasted Merganser (Mergus serrator); and that exceeding rarity, the Pink-footed Goose (Anser phœnicopus). This last species was first distinguished from the Bean Goose (A. ferus), which it closely resembles, by M. Baillon, in 1833, and by Mr. Bartlett, in 1838. Its peculiar characteristics are the shortness of the beak and the peculiar pink colour of the legs and feet. This goose is believed to breed in the outer Hebrides, and several were observed in the London markets in 1838, 1839, and 1840. Since those dates, it has very rarely occurred in England. We have also been visited by a number of the beautiful Waxen Chatterer, or Bohemian Waxwing (Ampelis garrulus). Of these elegant birds, no less than sixteen have been shot in the immediate neighbourhood of Doncaster. Four were killed near Conisbro', two at Warmsworth, and one near Hexthorpe. It is only at short intervals, and during severe frost, that this beautiful bird ventures to brave a passage from the Continent in search of the berries of the mountain ash and the hips of the wild rose, on both of which fruits it delights to feed. It is now thirteen years since any number of the waxwing—so called from the singular and brilliant wax-like appendages on the wing coverts—has been seen in this country; and it is highly probable that a similar period may elapse before another opportunity is afforded to naturalists of adding this beautiful stranger to their collections.

Interesting as this information may be to naturalists, it has produced the following kindly remonstrance, in a letter to the Editor of the Times, from one whose tender sympathies have been moved in defence of these "feathered tribes."

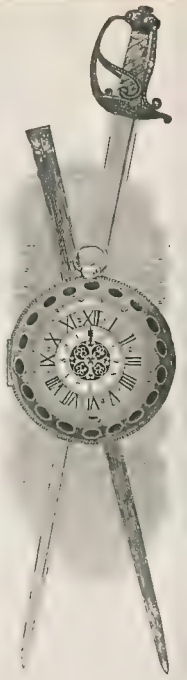
"Sir,—One frequently reads in the newspapers that some feathered visitant to our shores, 'rarely found in this country, has recently been shot by Mr. So-and-so.' Do, pray, allow me, sir, through your powerful agency, to raise my feeble voice against this cruel, useless, and oft-repeated practice. The Times of to-day gives, from the Doncaster Gazette, a long list of these atrocities. In the list of the slaughtered we find there were 'of the beautiful waxen chatterer, or Bohemian waxwing, no less than sixteen,' of which nine are now in the hands of one person. The writer adds, 'It is only at short (rare ?) intervals this beautiful bird ventures to brave a passage from the Continent in search of the berries of the mountain ash and the hips of the wild rose, on which it delights to feed. It is now thirteen years since any number of the wax-wings has been seen in this country.' Can any one, sir, read this little episode—it is repeated over and over again every month and every year—without a feeling of sorrow? A little stranger flies to England, driven from an inhospitable home, in search of the humblest fare, and finds its resting-place on some bird-collector's shelves. May it not be possible, sir, by being less cruel and more generous, and thus securing the more frequent return to, if not the permanent residence of those beautiful creatures in, our country, to spare both the curiosity and paragraph-mongers much of the trouble which their pursuits entail?

"Your obedient servant,

"Gloucester-square, Hyde-park, Jan. 26. A WOMAN."

CURIOSITIES.—XIII.

SWORD AND WATCH OF OLIVER CROMWELL.



SWORD AND WATCH OF OLIVER CROMWELL.

The Sword represented in the annexed Engraving is in the very interesting collection of antiquities in the United Service Museum. This sword is the identical weapon used by Oliver Cromwell at the siege of Drogheda, on the 10th of September, 1649; and it bears on its blade the tokens of war, as there are the marks of two musket bullets on it, which present the appearance of fractures in a peculiar star-like form. The hilt and guard are parcel black, and richly ornamented with gilded trophies, arabesques, &c.; the grip is of black shagreen.

The history of the Sword, as related in the catalogue of the Museum, is that it was inherited by Joshua S. Simmons Smith, Esq., as a collateral descendant of the Protector; and it was presented by him to the Museum. It is related that, at the siege of Drogheda, Cromwell's troops mounted the breach twice, and were twice repelled; but that he himself led at the third assault, and conquered.

The Watch is a singular specimen, and bears the name of Jaques Cartier as its manufacturer. The outer case of the Watch is of leather, perforated, and studded with silver. In Scott's "Antiquarian Gleanings in the North of England," whence our representation is copied, the Watch is said to be a repeater; but we apprehend it is a clock watch, which strikes the hours, as repeaters, strictly so called, are of rather more recent date than this one. This Watch is in possession of J. H. Fawkes, Esq., of Farnley Hall.

It is scarcely necessary to observe that the Watch and Sword are not drawn of their proper relative sizes.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

SUPPLEMENT.

SUPPLEMENT TO No. 412.] SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1850. [GRATIS.

EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

THIS is the forty-fourth exhibition of "modern masters" at the British Institution, and is one, we think, of a very pleasing character—one, indeed, of more than average merit. The number of exhibitors is 339, and the number of works exhibited 500, or not two works apiece. The most prolific contributor is Mr. Lance, the fruit painter, who has six pictures, and all of merit.

The striking feature of the Exhibition is, that, with the single exception of Mr. George Jones, R.A., it is wholly unsupported by the forty Royal Academicians. Mr. Jones could be spared, we think, without much, or indeed any, detriment to the merit of the Exhibition. It was once otherwise at the British Institution. The Royal Academicians, we remember, used formerly to occupy the principal places in the North or best Room. Till within these very few years Edwin Landseer used to send. We believe this change may be attributed to the increased sale of works of art; and that where purchases used to be effected in the Exhibition room, they are now made almost entirely in the studios of the artists. The British Institution, it should always be remembered, was established for facilitating the sale of pictures by living British artists, and that one of its leading characteristics is the exclusion of portraits from its walls.

Six Associates of the Royal Academy contribute to the Exhibition—Mr. Sydney Cooper has three pictures; Mr. Creswick three; Mr. Redgrave one; Mr. Frost one; Mr. Danby one; and Mr. Marshall has a bust of "Sabrina." Of the 500 works of art, therefore, of which the Exhibition consists, twelve alone are contributed by that influential body against which Mr. Coningham and the Times are now running a tilt.

Most of our readers are aware of the size, and shape, and lighting of the British Institution; that the gallery, so called, consists of three rooms, with a staircase running up the centre, so as to turn every inch of ground to good account; that the principal room is to the north, and that a better light for pictures could hardly be desired. But we may observe in passing, that the plan of the central staircase might be imitated at the National Gallery, with much advantage. The waste of room at the Gallery with that excessive hall, is much to deplored.

The places of honour in the present Exhibition have been assigned by the "hanging" directors to Mr. Sydney Cooper, Mr. F. Goodall, Mr. Frank Stone, Mr. Linnell, Mr. Jutsum, Mr. Creswick, and others. Mr. Cooper occupies the place of honour immediately above the fire-place—a capital position for a cabinet picture; Mr. F. Goodall has the centre of the east side of the principal room, and Mr. F. Stone the centre of the west side. Mr. Goodall is supported by Mr. E. W. Cooke and Mr. Jutsum; and Mr. Stone by Mr. Hardy and Mr. Linnell.

The amoitious painters, as far as subject is concerned, are Sir George Hayter, who sends "Our Saviour after the Temptation;" Mr. Salter, who exhibits "The Toilet of Venus;" and Mr. Newenham, who contributes "Oliver Cromwell dictating to Milton." The less ambitious painters, and, certainly, the more successful, are Mr. Frost, Mr. Danby, Mr. Sydney Cooper, Mr. Creswick, Mr. F. Goodall, Mr. Lance, Mr. Linnell, Mr. E. W. Cooke, Mr. F. Stone, Mr. Copley Fielding, Mr. Jutsum, Mr. Ansdell, Mr. Herring, Mr. Gilbert, Mr. G. Cole, and Mr. Carpenter. The gem or Jew's-eye of the Exhibition is a small picture by Mr. Frost, "Musidora," from Thomson's "Seasons." But the most taking with the public at large will be found to be Mr. Stone's "Sympathy," and Mr. Goodall's "Village Post-Office." In the high poetic line Mr. Danby takes the lead. But in real excellence of landscape art the palm of superiority must be given to Mr. Linnell on land and to Mr. Cooke at sea. After this brief prefatory description we shall now proceed with our comments, taking the pictures in the numerical order in which they are presented to us.

No. 1. "A Group on a Common." T. Sydney Cooper, A.R.A.—This carefully-finished picture occupies the place of honour over the fire-place, in the North Room, and represents a donkey and three sheep. The drawing and colouring are of the greatest nicety of hand and touch. It is a small picture, two feet two inches by two feet six inches, and is in Mr. Cooper's best style. There is the blow of a healthy breeze upon the canvas. It is long since we have seen a donkey among the cattle pieces of this unequalled master in his own way—the Cuyp of our English school of art.

2. "Medora." W. Fisher.—A half-length portrait of an Eastern lady, as the name denotes. The face is very beautiful, the expression good, and the execution careful. It forms a striking but pleasing contrast to its pendent "The Highland Gleaner (No. 17).

3. "A Farm-yard." J. F. Herring.—One of those masterly representations of horses, ponies, pigs, peacocks, and ducks, for which Mr. Herring is so deservedly distinguished. We doubt if he has succeeded on any other occasion in rendering the texture of the skin of horses with such painstaking truth of touch as in the picture before us, which, in point of size (three feet five inches by four feet one inch), as well as of execution, is one of Mr. Herring's most successful works. This picture will bear the minutest examination throughout—there is no shirking in any part of it.

6. "A View of Peath, in Hungary." G. Jones, R.A.—A small picture, chiefly remarkable as the contribution of a Royal Academician. The composition is not displeasing, but the execution is feeble and monotonous. It is not, however, devoid of truth.

7. "A Study." C. Wilson.—A clever little picture, representing a cottage-girl seated, with her bonnet dangling from her left arm, and her hands folded before her. It is a small full-length, most carefully painted. The expression of the face is thoughtful and appropriate.

16. "Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector of England, dictating to John Milton, his Latin secretary, the celebrated despatch in favour of the persecuted Protestants of the Valleys of Piedmont." The Protector declared his determination to move the power of England in their behalf, if justice were not promptly rendered them.—F. Newenham.

> Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughter'd saints, whose bones
> Lie scatter'd on the Alpine mountains cold;
> Ev'n them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
> When all our fathers worshipt stocks and stones.
> Forget not, in thy book record their groans
> Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
> Slain by the bloody Piedmontese, that roll'd
> Mother with infant down the rocks.—Milton's Sonnets.

This is a large picture of 9 feet in height by 11 feet 10 inches in width, with figures of Cromwell and Milton of the size of life. Milton is seated listening to catch the words as Cromwell utters them. There is great dignity about Cromwell's face and figure, and the youthful look of Milton has been caught successfully. All the accessories—the chest with its iron bands, the carved table and chair, the globe, &c.—are all well introduced and well painted. But Cromwell may be dictating any other dispatch than that in favour of the persecuted Protestants of Piedmont. There is nothing to mark or indicate the particular dispatch. Painters often fall into this error. We have more than one picture representing the Duke of Wellington writing his Waterloo dispatch; but one and all might be called his Salamanca or his Talavera dispatch, so almost impossible is it to represent a real difficulty of this kind. When the sculptor Gratian was given to Chantrey, the committee asked the artist to place the statue on "the rock of the Constitution," for a pedestal. "But how," said Chantrey, "am I to represent this particular rock? Shall I carve a rock and cut beneath; 'This is the rock of the Constitution?'—I know no other way." So with Mr. Newenham; we want the catalogue to tell us that this is the Piedmontese despatch The price of the picture is 300 guineas.

17. "The Highland Gleaner." T. Brooks.—Hardly worthy of Wordsworth's beautiful lines—

> Sweet Highland girl! a very shower
> Of beauty is thy earthly dower;

but still a nice picture, and true to the characteristics of Scottish beauty. The artist has caught the ruddy look of health very successfully.

18. "The Miller's Home." T. Creswick, A.R.A.—One of those truthful representations of English scenery for which Mr. Creswick is so deservedly distinguished. The very title conjures up pleasant associations, all of which Mr. Creswick has happily succeeded in transferring to his canvas. The rustic stone bridge, the groups of happy children, the sweet position of the mill, the running water, are all most appropriately introduced and rendered. This we have had engraved for our present paper.

19. "Kenilworth from the Tilt-Yard." G. Barnard.—True and careful: a little picture which every year will invest with greater interest.

21. "Rich and Ripe." G. Lance. (Two pictures of grapes and peaches in one frame.)—Marvellous for truth, and sufficient to justify the story of the bird which pecked at the painted grapes of the Greek artist.

22. "Study of Kids." J. F. Herring.—A small and very beautiful picture. The still life is admirably painted; the birch-broom and old boots most appropriately introduced.

30. "Astronomy." J. Sant.—A fine picture, representing, in a circle, a female head gazing heavenward. The figure is leaning over a globe; the expression is poetic. How grand was Raphael in subjects of this nature! how noble in his "Philosophy!" how still nobler in his "Poetry!" This is the best picture that we have ever seen from Mr. Sant's pencil. It is marked 'sold,' and deserved to find an early and a liberal purchaser.

40. "The Regretted Companion." R. Ansdell.—A large oblong picture, representing an old wayfaring man kneeling by the side of his ass, a pretty girl as a friend. The thoughtful look of the old man is shared that has just expired. The thoughtful look of the old man is shared by his dog. The dead ass, the dog—every portion of animal nature—is painted with admirable dexterity and truth. The story, too, is well told. The hands of the old man are careful, and finished studies from nature.

45. "Dutch Pilots Warping their Craft out of Harbour in Rough Weather." E. W. Cooke.—A busy scene, full of sea life, and suggestive of healthy breezes. Mr. Cooke's well-deserved reputation for pictures of this character hardly requires that we should say more than that he is here true to himself and to nature, as well as to the peculiarities of Dutch skies and Dutch craft. No artist more thoroughly understands the different hues of sky and sea scene which characterise the countries of Cuyp, Vanderveide, and Ruysdael. Mr. Cooke should paint three pictures in one frame, with divisions, showing the peculiarities which he feels, and can paint so thoroughly.

52. "The Post-Office." F. Goodall.—This is Mr. Goodall's single contribution to the Exhibition. It is a large picture, 4 ft. 5 in. in height by 5 ft. 10 in. in width, and represents the exterior of a country post-office, with a barber busy reading the Times aloud to a group of anxious listeners: a boy loiters with his tray of fish; the "boots" of an inn (another Sam Weller) ceases to polish a pair of top boots; and all the different hues of sky and scene which characterise the countries of Cuyp, Vanderveide, and Ruysdael. Mr. Cooke should paint three pictures in one frame, with divisions, showing the peculiarities which he feels, and can paint so thoroughly.

52. "The Post-Office." F. Goodall.—This is Mr. Goodall's single contribution to the Exhibition. It is a large picture, 4 ft. 5 in. in height by 5 ft. 10 in. in width, and represents the exterior of a country post-office, with a barber busy reading the Times aloud to a group of anxious listeners: a boy loiters with his tray of fish; the "boots" of an inn (another Sam Weller) ceases to polish a pair of top boots; and all gather round the consequential barber. In another part of the picture, gather round the consequential barber. In another part of the picture, a pretty girl is reading a letter she has just received to an old Chelsea pensioner. On the door-step of the office, another pretty girl, overcome with the news she has received, is hiding her head in grief; while, with admirable indifference to what is passing, the guard of the mail, who had brought the post-bag, is whistling aloud, as if to say, "This is stale news to me! I knew all this before I mounted my box." Such is the story of the picture. The execution is, of course, careful: every part has been well considered; but the composition is somewhat scattered, and the expression of the several faces is not above the ordinary mark of Mr. Goodall's former pictures. This we have had engraved.

54. "The Salmon-Leap at Lymmouth, North Devon"—J. Uwins—is the work of a young artist, who seems to divide his time between Italy and Devon. He has shown great variety in what he does. He is more true, however, to Italy than to England.

56. "A Peep in the Palace of William III." J. D. Wingfield.—A carefully-painted interior of that part of Hampton Court Palace wherein the Charles II. beauties are hung. The picture supplies a peep into the adjoining room. The portraits of the beauties are faithfully introduced. This is a nice memorial of an Anglo-Dutch palace.

57. "Evening: Coming Home to the Farm." H. Jutsum.—A large landscape, 4 feet in height by 5 feet 5 inches in width, and certainly the best picture (in point of composition and execution) that we have seen of Mr. Jutsum's. It is true to English scenery, and to the effect of evening. It is marked "sold." Good pictures are soon picked up. A really good picture is seldom suffered to pass unsold.

64. "The Plays of Shakspeare." J. Gilbert.—A clever embodiment of all the principal characters in the plays of Shakspere, not on Stothard's principle—seen on one line, but on a double stage. The principal figures are Henry VIII., Shylock, and Lear; but every character has its due consequence on the canvas. The grouping is most ingenious, and the several attributes most carefully distinguished. There is some nice painting in parts.

70. "Scene near Cuckfield, Sussex." Copley Fielding.—A little bit of genuine wild English nature: containing many of the beauties which Mr. Fielding catches so well in water-colours transferred to canvas. The peep between the stems of the trees at the stack of red and white buildings is introduced with great judgment and effect.

77. "Elizabeth Castle, Jersey"—R. C. Leslie—is by the son of Mr. C. R. Leslie, the Royal Academician. Young Mr. Leslie is improving in his art, but his advance is less rapid than an earlier effort, still better than this, had taught us to expect.

78. "A Girl with Water-cresses." E. U. Eddis.—A full-length, seated on a bank, nearly the size of life; far from good in point of colour, but with a thoughtful character of look about it both pleasing and appropriate. Mr. Eddis is always attentive to the requirements of his art, but he has not a good eye for colour. His drawing is generally careful.

81. "Domestic Ducks." J. F. Herring.—A small oval. Mr. Herring is as true to duck nature as Mr. Lance is true to fruit nature, and Mr. W. Hunt to flower nature. The execution in this picture is particularly careful.

87. "The Corsair." E. W. Cooke.

> O'er the hush'd deep the yellow beam he throws,
> Gilds the green wave, that trembles as it glows.

One of those beautiful coast scenes of Italy, which the admirers of Mr. Cooke call upon him to multiply from year to year. A sweeter picture, of its class and character, Mr. Cooke never painted. It is sold.

88. "A Group in the Meadows." T. Sydney Cooper, A.R.A.—Three cows—most beautifully drawn. An unusually small-sized picture for Mr. Cooper.—2 ft. 7 in. by 3 ft. 1 in.

94 "Morning." J. P. Pettitt.

> Nor hung the sun his daily course withheld,
> But added colours to the world revealed.—DRYDEN.

Dryden has not been very successful in his descriptions of external nature; and this, which Mr. Pettitt quotes in illustration of his picture, is one of his worst. It is not worse, however, than the picture it is dragged in to illustrate.

96. "The Watchful Shepherd." R. Redgrave, A.R.A.—Mr. Redgrave's single contribution to the Exhibition, representing the slope of a hill, on which sheep are feeding, with a peep into one of those thickets which Mr. Redgrave is so fond of painting. The execution is unusually hard, but the general composition is novel and pleasing.

97. "Harvest Time." F. Taylor.—A small half-length of a gleaner carrying wheat on her head. The pose of the figure is good, and the face pretty; but it has more studio nature about it, than field nature.

98. "Painting." C. H. Stanley, jun.—A small full-length, representing a young lady copying a picture by Cuyp. She wears a bonnet, and her face is altogether unseen. The execution is careful, but hard.

100. "Sancho's Surprise on seeing the Squire of the Woods' Nose." George Cruikshank.—By the admirable caricaturist, who has this year (for the first time, we believe) taken to painting in oil-colours. Mr. Cruikshank will not add to his reputation by pictures of this class and character. It is very bad.

101. "Cottage Scene: Dolgelly, North Wales." R. Brandard.—An interior, painted in a style something between Isaac Ostade and F. Goodall. There is a young mother, a cottage repast, a girl feeding a goat, chickens feeding, &c. The feeling throughout is excellent: the execution, too, is good.

102. "The Jewels and the Gem." G. Lance.—Rich stones most richly painted. The gem is a miniature of the Princess Royal set in diamonds.

107. "The Pilgrim—vide 'All's Well that Ends Well.'" H. W. Phillips.—A female head, by the son of the late Royal Academician Phillips. There is a solemn thoughtfulness about this head, that lifts it a little beyond mere portraiture.

118. "Fecamp, Coast of Normandy." J. D. Harding.—Mr. Harding's single contribution to the collection. The composition is careful; but it is not what collectors call a pleasing picture. It is true to the coast of Normandy, and reminds us, in parts, of Mr. Collins.

120. "Gypsy Trampers." F. Tayler.—Girls (with donkeys) begging. The look of the elder girl, who is holding out a hat, is nicely felt and rendered. The group is well pat together, and the whole picture is in Mr. Tayler's best manner; and what that manner is, is well known to all Exhibition-goers.

124. "Southdown." T. Creswick, A.R.A., and R. Ansdell.—A joint affair (we disavow the least allusion to a joke)—one of those combinations which Callcott and Landseer, Lee and Cooper, have rendered so popular. Mr. Ansdell has painted the sheep, and Mr. Creswick the down, with all their accustomed truth of nature and dexterity of pencil. We hope to see them again in other and equally successful efforts. This sort of combinations puts both artists on their mettle.

129. "Sympathy." F. Stone.—Two beautiful girls; one sympathising with, and soothing the (nicely indicated) sorrow of the other. We could have wished that the dresses had been somewhat different—less like Stone's well-known style. But with the faces we could not wish for the slightest change. This charming picture has been bought by Mr. Graves, of Pall-mall, and will be engraved.

133. "Opening the Gate." J. Linnell.—A small landscape, fit, in point of size, for any gentleman's drawing-room, and fit, in point of quality and execution, for any collection of English pictures. The cows and children might be somewhat better defined—but with the trees, the foliage throughout, and the distance, there could be no change that would tend to improve it. A sweeter landscape Mr. Linnell never painted.

134. "Minna Troil—vide 'The Pirate.'" T. M. Joy.—One of those transition-pictures, half portrait, half ideal. We will not say that Mr. Joy has caught the Minna Troil of the great novelist, but he has succeeded in making a pleasing work of art.

137. "A Welsh Mill." H. J. Boddington.—With all Mr. Boddington's well-known fidelity and finish.

138. "The Novice." Alex. Johnston.

> This vestal cloak shall fold my fading bloom—
> Of virgin vows and purity the token.
> This cell, sepulchral-like, shall be the tomb
> Of wither'd hopes, vows broke as soon as spoken;
> Of love despised, of peace destroy'd and of a heart quite broken.
> MS., WALKER MARSHALL.

Small full-length of a lady fastening a bracelet. It is not good in point of expression, or even of composition, but it is rich in colour. The "Novice" would seem a misnomer.

140. "Dover." J. Holland.

> There is a cliff, whose high and bending head
> Looks fearfully in the confused deep.—SHAKSPEARE.

One of those pictures representing common scenes which defy detection. But for the catalogue, we shou d never have taken this odd combination of blue and red for Shakspeare's Cliff. This is a perversion of landscape painting. Dull, common fidelity is better than this.

143. "Musidora." W. E. Frost, A.R.A.

> At the doubtful breeze alarmed.

We have already alluded to this charming little picture, as the gem of the Exhibition. Often as "Musidora" has been painted before, she was never made so beautiful, or done so much artistic justice to, as by Mr. Frost in this picture. For exquisite female delicacy, for beauty of face, and general excellence of composition, this little picture is worth attention to the pictures of Mr. Stanfield and Mr. Roberts. We do not wish to see these artists re-produced at second-hand; but there is much that Mr. Goodall might learn with advantage, without copying.

166. "The Triumph of Venus." W. Fisher.

> She, with a subtle smile in her mild eyes,
> The conscious stir of her triumph drawing nigh,
> Half-whisper'd in his ear, "I promise thee
> The fairest and most loving wife in Greece."
> She spoke and laugh'd: I shut my sight for fear;
> But when I look'd, Paris had raised his arm,
> And I beheld great Juno's angry eyes,
> As she withdrew into the golden cloud.
> Œnone.—ALFRED TENNYSON.

This is by the painter of "Medora" (No. 2), already noticed. We have said that Mr. Goodall might study Roberts and Stanfield with advantage, so in the same way Mr. Fisher might study Mr. Frost. "The Musidora" (No. 143) has all those excellences which the Venus should have in the same degree. There is merit in Mr. Fisher's composition and some nice painting in parts. He works as if he loved his subject and he shows that love for what he is about.

157. "English Peasantry." W. E. D. Stuart.—This is an oval, representing the interior of a kitchen, with a young mother and young affectionate husband by her side, an old woman teaching a child, and a girl and a boy making love of the back-kitchen. It is very stiffly painted, but the idea is not ill made out, while the whole picture evinces a promise of success in future efforts.

We now enter the MIDDLE ROOM.

169. "Castle of Wellburg." C. R. Stanley.—A large and an ambitious picture, somewhat in the style of Mr. Pyne, but without his airy excellence and his knowledge of perspective. There is much, however, in many parts, that is good, and it is a large picture.

178. "San Lorenzo, Coast of Genoa." T. S. Robins.—We have too many pictures annually produced hovering on the debateable land between amateur art and artistic excellence, and we take this picture to be a composition of the kind. Artists only half-fledged should restrict their flights, and take less canvas. What is pardonable on a small scale, becomes offensive when paraded on a large surface. Mr. Robins, however, has many merits to redeem his defects.

182. "Ruins of the Library in Hadrian's Villa." W. Linton.—A small but most effective little picture, imbued with the poetry of association which it calls up. There is not much in it in point of labour, but what is there is good.

184. "A View of Buda and Ofan, from Pesth." G. Jones, R.A.—Only remarkable as the work of a Royal Academician.

191. "A Good Place for Trout." T. Danby.—Not up to the mark of Mr. Danby's last year's efforts. Let us trust that he is reserving himself, as we hear he is, for the Royal Academy Exhibition. It is frequently unfair to weigh the merits of an artist by his British Institution pictures, which are generally small things painted to pay off Christmas bills; the greater efforts are sent to the Academy.

192. "The Portico of the National Gallery." A. C. Hayter, jun.—A most ingenious piece of composition, in which the steeple of St. Martin's is introduced with good effect. The figures between the columns and on the steps are well arranged and well painted.

196. "Blenheim." G. E. Hering.—A well-painted view of the Palace from the water: a capital illustration of the justice of Sir Joshua Reynolds's criticism on the picturesque character of Vanbrugh's architecture. Reynolds said that Vanbrugh treated his building as part of a landscape, and Mr. Hering has shown how true the criticism is, by the skill which he has shown in this assimilation.

198 "A Golden Moment." F. Danby, A.R.A.

> The robin on the gilded spray
> Chants his vesper to the dying day;
> The wild-fowl, with her yellow brood,
> Paddles beneath the hanging wood;
> Where most the woodland choir now
> Already nestle on the shaded bough;
> While insect millions, in their only day,
> Still lingering fill the glowing ray.

A red evening effect, painted with surprising skill, and dipped in the finest poetry—much finer poetry than Mr. Danby has given in illustration of his meaning. But the picture is not in want of verse to explain its beauties, though its fine poetic qualities are of that high character which the lovers of literal landscape will fail to appreciate, and may miss entirely. "A Golden Moment" is like a picture by an old master, accidentally introduced into a room where all is new.

199. "Cranmer summoned before the Privy Council: Thomas Wriothesley, Chancellor; Lord Paget, Secretary; Lord Russell; Duke of Norfolk; Seymour, Duke of Somerset; Thomas Lord Seymour, and Bishop Gardiner." E. Morris.

Henry sent for Cranmer, and said, "Go you to the council, and demand to be confronted with your accuser. Should there be a moment's hesitation, produce this ring." Cranmer followed the instruction of his Sovereign, but his righteous request was made in vain; their Lordships insisted upon his immediate commitment to the Tower. Upon this Cranmer produced the ring.—Life of Cranmer.

Our criticism must be very short. Mr. Morris has not wrought successfully: his Cranmer, though not ill conceived, is but a poor candidate for future martyrdom.

203. "Aladdin's Present to the Sultan." J. Gilbert.—Another of these versatile effects of Mr. Gilbert's facile pencil; but not, we think, in his happiest mood.

205. "Lance Reproving his Dog." Left unfinished by the late Sir A. W. Calcott, and completed by J. Calcott Horsley.—A favourite subject with artists; every exhibition having at least one Lance. What each would call the scene (a Boccaccio-like garden) is admirably chosen; but Lance is not very characteristic, and his dog is somewhat indifferently painted. Landseer has taught us to like dogs only as he has painted them. Mr. Ansdell himself suffers by such comparison. It was well and wittily said that Mr. Ansdell was an admirable artist when you compared him with nature, but he would not do when you compared him with Landseer.

206. "An Old Well on the Appian Way, Campagna of Rome." J. Uwins.—An illustration of the justice of our former remark, that Mr. Uwins is happier in rendering Italian, than he is English scenery. This is nicely painted.

210. "A Fruit Shop at Angers." E. A. Goodall.—Careful, as Mr. Goodall never fails to be, and better than the general average of his pictures. Angers, we observe, has been his field of study during the last autumn.

211. "Piazzetta di S. Marco." J. Holland.—This is by the painter of the eccentric "Dover," which we have recently condemned. When Mr. Holland can paint thus charmingly, why should he play such will-o'-the-wisp tricks with his palette and pencils? The deep rich colouring of this picture is especially fine.

212. "The Purchased Flock." J. Linnell.—A smaller picture than Mr. Linnell's other contribution to the rooms, but conceived and executed in the same masterly spirit and manner. A more desirable specimen of Mr. Linnell's art we have never seen. It holds the post of honour in the middle of the room, and found a purchaser at once.

213. "Chiavara on the Riviera di Levanti." G. E. Hering.—A companion picture to Mr. Holland's "Piazzetta;" more thinly painted (somewhat in Mr. Pyne's manner), but clever and effective. We must continue to watch Mr. Hering's progress. The "Blenheim" just noticed, and the picture now under review, are not every-day productions.

214. "The Desert Steed." C. Tschaggeny.—A large picture, representing an Arabian desert, and a horse of the true breed, painted sufficiently well to satisfy a jockey.

221. "The Disputed Point." R. Brandard.—We have already noticed a clever interior of an Irish cottage by Mr. Brandard; but this is a different way, and is equally clever. It is a kind of "Wilkie's Village Politicians," but painted more in Bird's manner than in Wilkie's. If Mr. Brandard could colour as well as Mr. Goodall, or Mr. Goodall catch character and expression as well as Mr. Brandard, both would be much better artists than they are at present.

228. "Porto Pesaro; Gulf of Sgnezzia." G. E. Hering.—Another of Mr Hering's careful studies, and one which fully justifies all our previous commendations.

248. "Interior: Royal Chapel, Hampton Court." J. D. Wingfield.—The view is from the Royal pew—a somewhat disadvantageous position, as it lessens the apparent height of the roof. No one enters more zealously than Mr. Wingfield into all the parts and points of interest in old buildings, and few catch Hampton Court character with more artistic excellence. He is apt to be hard, but this hardness suits wood or stone.

256. "Morning: the Stream in the Hills." T. Creswick, A.R.A.—One of those fine Creswick-like pictures which brings to mind the line in Thomson—

> Now down the steep the dashing torrent flies and that glorious stanza in Burn's "Hallowe'en":—

> Whyles owre a linn the burnie plays,
> As through the glen it wimpl't;
> Whyles round a rocky scar it strays,
> Whyles in a wheel it dimpl't:
> Whyles glittered to the nightly rays,
> Wi' bickering dancing dazzle;
> Whyles cookit underneath the braes,
> Below the spreading hazel.

We recommend the stanza to Mr. Creswick. He would make a fine composition from such genuine nature as Burns has given.

258. "Detaining a Customer." R. McInnes.—A small picture, representing a shoemaker with his fiddle, intent on learning a favourite tune. He is reminded by an old woman, that whilst he is thus engaged a customer (a young girl, nicely painted) is waiting to be served. The lesson "to mind your business before your pleasure" is well made out.

259. "By the rivers of Babylon there we sat down, yea we wept, when we remembered Zion." Psalm cxxxvii, v. 1. W. Gale.—A subject much beyond Mr. Gale's pencil.

178. "Jeanie Deans and the Laird of Dumbiedikes," Alex. Frazer.—

> "Jeanie, I will make ye Lady Dumbiedikes afore the sun sets, and ye may ride to Lunnon in your ain coach, if ye like. Take what siller will serve ye."—Heart of Mid-Lothian.

We are glad to see Mr. Frazer again an exhibitor, and in his old Wilkie-and-Allan like way. There is much that is excellent in Jeanie, and old Dumbiedikes is full of character.

283 "Borgo Castello, Calabria Ultra." W. Linton.—One of Mr. Linton's most effective compositions, revealing all his appreciation of the poetry of landscape nature. It was well said by Fuseli, that "selection is the invention of a landscape painter." This quality of "selection" is generally apparent in all Mr. Linton's transcripts from nature.

290. "Our Saviour after the Temptation." Sir George Hayter, M.A.S.L.

> Again the Devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and showeth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. . . . . Then the Devil leaveth him, and behold, angels came and ministered unto him.—St. Matthew, chap. iv.

There is much that is good in the composition of this picture, and, considering the grandeur of the subject, a great deal that is excellent. (We shall engrave this Picture in a future Number.)

301. "Don Quixote and Sancho Panza in Pedro's Hut." G. Cole.—This is a clever picture, and is marked "sold," but at a price far below its merits, viz. twenty-five guineas. The general arrangement is capital, the character throughout well preserved, and some of the painting firm and excellent. We do not remember seeing on canvas a better Rosinante. Mr. Cole is a new name in art, and apparently an accession.

311. "Myrrha." H. O'Neil.—A small three-quarter picture of a female, painted with all that delicacy of touch for which Mr. O'Neil has acquired a well-earned reputation. There is a tranquil thoughtfulness and beauty about the face, that is particularly winning. The shot-silk dress is, however, somewhat Swan-and-Edgarish. The price is fifty guineas, nor is it dear at that price.

We now enter the third, and last, room—called in the catalogue the SOUTH ROOM.

317. "The Departure of the Chevalier Bayard from Brescia." J. C. Hook.

> As he quitted the chamber to take horse, the two fair damsels met him, each bearing a little offering which she had worked during his sickness. Greatly did the brave knight thank them for this courtesy, saying that such presents from such lovely hands were worth ten thousand crowns. Then gallantly fastening the bracelets on his arm, and the purse on his sleeve, he vowed to wear them both for the honour of the fair donors while his life endured.—Life of the Chevalier Bayard.

There is much to commend in the conception and execution of this picture. The Chevalier himself is well painted; and the squire, or page, who is fastening on his master's spurs, is well drawn and appropriately introduced, so as to vary the arrangement of the composition.

326. "A Dead Drake." H. Weekes, jun.—The first production of the son of Mr. Weekes, the sculptor, and assistant of Sir Francis Chantrey. It is small, and is hung too high to be seen to advantage. It shews an eye for nature.

333. "Interior of a Cottage, Kent." G. Hardy.—Most carefully and minutely painted; but not exhibiting any advance on Mr. Hardy's part.

352. "A Bit of Holland." E. W. Cooke.—A little bit, indeed, but quite a gem in its way—speaking pleasantly of Vanderveldes and Ruysdael. The pitch, we observe, is twenty guineas. Mr. Cooke is fond of painting these small slips of sea views, and he knows wherein his strength consists.

361. "At Undercliff, Isle of Wight." Sidney R. Percy.—A beautiful bit of wild nature, placed on the canvas with a fine and masterly touch. This is no common artist; and seldom, indeed, have we seen a truer rendering of nature of this description. The glimpse of the sea is introduced with skill, and gives variety to the composition.

367. "Master's Out; or, the Painter's Holiday." R. W. Buss.—Mr. Buss is one of Mr. Kidd's school; and, though always clever, he never gets beyond cleverness.

368. "Nature and Art." G. Lance.—Two small circular pictures, in one frame, representing fruit in one, and in the other jewels set in gold. Shall we say, with the fine lady in Swift, "Nature must give way to art?"

369. "The Villa Borghese, from the Walls of Rome." E. W. Cooke.—The whole of the trees included in the scene, with Raphaelle's house on the left, were razed to the ground by the Romans in 1849, to prevent the occupation of the villa by the French troops.

Mr. Cooke has evidently indulged in throwing an air of melancholy over his picture, as if the trees were conscious of their coming destruction. This is an enviable memorial of what was once a lovely scene.

376. "Sleep and Death conveying the body of Sarpedon to Lycia." J. Wood.

> Then Sleep and Death, two twins of winged race,
> Of matchless swiftness, but of silent pace,
> Receiv'd Sarpedon at the god's command,
> And in a moment reach'd the Lycian land;
> The corse amid his weeping friends they laid,
> Where endless honours wait the sacred shade.—POPE'S Homer.

This well-grouped composition reminds us of the late Mr. Watson's admirable bas-relief of the same subject; but Mr. Wood's picture is not a cento, by any means, from Mr. Watson.

381. "Valentine's Day." R. Farrier.—A boy behind a door, laughing at a knot of pretty girls, who are reading and enjoying the Valentine he has sent one of them. There is much quiet merriment in this picture, and some good painting.

388. "The First Impression." H. C. Selous.—This is a picture representing Gutteniburg showing to his wife his first experiment in printing from moveable types. The whole composition is too made-up, and the accessories are somewhat violently introduced. The lady is a great deal too grand.

394. "The Cattle Fair." Aster R. C. Corbould.—A large truthful picture, well grouped, and full of character, but painted in a hard, tentray manner.

401. "The Evening Sun upon a Mountain called Tryfan, in North Wales." T. Danby.—Painted with a large portion of that poetic appreciation of nature which distinguishes the compositions of Mr. Danby's father; the style, however, is quite Mr. T. Danby's own, and it is good.

403. "Spanish Produce." G. Lance.—Another of Mr. Lance's delightful transcripts from nature.

410. "A Study of Weeds." James Hall.—Evidently copied direct from nature by one whose skill is not equal to his appreciation of what is beautiful.

412. "Mole Guest, near Port Madoc, North Wales." J. Danby.—A clever landscape, by another of Mr. Danby's sons. Lord Northwick has bought it since the Exhibition opened.

413. "Venus dissuading Adonis from the Chase." W. Salter.—Mr. Salter is a worthy follower of what is high and exalted in art. He does not deal with common subjects; Scripture and the Classics are his text-books. He is decidedly better this year than he has been for some time: his drawing has improved.

425. "The Interview between James IV. and the celebrated outlaw Murray, on Fermen's-cote, on the banks of the Yarrow." J. M. Joy.

> Out! Gods forbade, quoth the outlaw, then
> I hope your grace will better be:
> Else ere you come to Edinburgh port,
> I trow thun guarded sell ye be.
> The lands of Ettrick forest fair,
> I won them from the enemie:
> Like as I wan them, sae will I keep them,
> Contrarie a' kings in Christendie.

Mr. Joy is evidently fond of Scotch traditions and ballads; and shews at times considerable skill in transferring them to canvas. He has here, however, been less successful than on former occasions. He is not enough with his subject.

427. "Remnants." G. Lance.—The remnants of a feast—a miscellaneous collection of fruit, capitally sorted for colour and effect.

429. "A Dead Drake." G. Lance.

> What shall he have who killed the drake?
> A jug of ale his thirst to slake,
> Such as the jolly fellows see
> In the foamy tankards of Trinity.—The Cambridge Garland.

Still life, most marvellous for execution, and somewhat different in subject from the usual run of Mr. Lance's works. Mr. Lance must himself enjoy a change from fruit and gems to brown jugs and the plumage of our native birds.

430. "Watering Cattle: Sunset." T. Sidney Cooper, A.R.A.—Admirably true to nature.

431. "Still Life." M. P. Jackson.—This is by the son of the late John Jackson, R.A., one of the best of our portrait painters (witness his admirable heads of Flaxman and Canova). We have always great pleasure in heralding to notice the first productions of the sons of eminent men. It is a just tribute to excellence. Mr. Jackson commences modestly and well. He is grounding himself in the grammar of his art.

445. "Disturbing the Congregation." George Cruikshank.—Mr. Cruikshank's second contribution. A boy has let his top slip from his hands, much to the annoyance of a pompous beadle, who hardly knows how to act. There is evidently a struggle between parochial duty and the Book of Common Prayer. Some of the boys are full of character—but when was Cruikshank deficient in character?

451. "Farm House and Mill, at Isques, near Boulogne." G. Stanfield.—By the son of Clarkson Stanfield. We notice with pleasure an improvement since last year.

452. "The Falconer." J. D. Wingfield.—Out of Mr. Wingfield's usual class of subjects, but still in his way. The execution is careful.

457. "The Peanland Hills, near Edinburgh, from the neighbourhood of Dalkeith." James Hall.—A more ambitious effort than "The Weeds," by the same artist, already noticed. Mr. Hall is an amateur, and therefore should not be too severely dealt with by the critics.

465. "The Toilet of Venus." W. Salter, M.A.F.—

> The ready Graces wait, her baths prepare,
> And stir with fragrant oils her flowing hair;
> Her flowing hair around her shoulders spreads,
> And all adown ambrosial odour sheds.
> Last, in transparent robes her limbs they fold,
> Enrich'd with ornaments of purest gold.
> And thus attired.—Homer's Hymn to Venus.—CONGREVE.

Venus is somewhat wanting in beauty—a sad deficiency in a subject of this nature. The colouring is rich and full.

466. "Interior of a Dartmoor Cottage." G. Hardy.—Very careful, but still not denoting any advance, we fear.

475. "Morning: A Scene in Devonshire."—F. C. Lewis—is chiefly remarkable as the production of a gentleman whose skill with the etching needle has never been surpassed. The best of Mr. Cousins's fine mezzotints were etched by Mr. Lewis.

488. "Titania; or, the Fairy Queen." J. G. Lough.

> For she his hairy temples then had rounded
> With coronet of fresh and fragrant flowers.
> Midsummer Night's Dream.

490. "Puck." J. G. Lough.

> What hempen home spuns have we swaggering here?
> Midsummer Night's Dream.

For the "Titania" Mr. Lough asks 500 guineas; and for the "Puck," 250 guineas. Both are in marble. The "Puck" deserves to find a purchaser; and, but for recent reverses in money matters, would no doubt have been sold when it was exhibited at Mr. Graves's, in Pall-mall.

491. "Hindoo Girl testing the Fate of her Lover." A model. T Earle.

Lalla Rookh was all curiosity, when one of her attendants informed the Princess that it was the usual way in which the friends of those who had gone on a dangerous voyage offered up vows for their safe return. If the lamp sunk immediately, the omen was disastrous; but if it went shining down the stream, and continued to burn till entirely out of sight, the return of the beloved object was considered as certain. Lalla Rookh.

Mr. Earle was long an ardent workman in the studio of Sir Francis Chantrey; but he did not catch his love of the poetry of his art in Chantrey's studio. His own sense of the beautiful has been his guide on all occasions, and he has seldom succeeded better than in the "Hindoo Girl," which deserves to be transferred to marble.

493. Bronze statuette of "Ariel directing the Storm." J Thomas.—By the able sculptor of the statues throughout the whole of the New Houses of Parliament.

496. "L'Allegro." Marble bust. J. Earle.

> Quips and cranks, and wanton wiles,
> Nods and becks, and wreathed smiles;
> Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
> And love to live on dimple sleek.—MILTON'S L'Allegro.

Somewhat wanting in Miltonic truthfulness; but who can work up to Milton's "L'Allegro?"

500. "Sabrina." A bust in marble. W. Calder Marshall.—The best piece of sculpture in the whole Exhibition, and somewhat nearer Milton than Mr. Earle's "L'Allegro."

DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT WEAPONS OF WARFARE.—While some labourers were employed a few weeks since in excavating for the foundation of a house at Slaughter Bridge, near Camelford, in Cornwall, they dug up some implements of ancient warfare, consisting of a battle-axe, a spear, and a spur, supposed to have lain buried there since the days of King Arthur. Tradition says that on that spot a sanguinary battle was fought between the troops of Arthur and those opposed to him, and that the nephew of Arthur was killed in the fight. His remains were interred near the spot, and were afterwards removed to Glastonbury. The persons who found the articles named gave them away, setting but little value on them. The spur is now in the possession of Mr. Creeper, of the White Hart Inn, Camelford.

LITERATURE.

EVANGELINE: A TALE OF ACADIE. By H. W. LONGFELLOW. London: David Bogue.

Evangeline is a beautiful story of village life in America. It has, in our estimation, but one fault; it is written in hexameters, whose rhythm—if rhythm it can be called—seems to us utterly irreconcileable with the genius of the English language. Mr. Longfellow has a fine ear for the music of words, and is a poet in the truest sense of the term. All who remember his beautiful lyrics, more especially his "Excelsior" and his "Hymn of Life," will gratefully acknowledge the pleasure derivable from his writings; but, in proportion to the greatness of their appreciation of his excellence as a lyrist, will be their disappointment on reading his hexameters. No poet, writing in the English language, could make a greater mistake than in wedding his thoughts to such a rhythm. Southey's failure, in "The Vision of Judgment," was sufficient to warn all other adventurers from such a waste of their time and genius as the cultivation of this ancient exotic, so utterly unsuited as he proved it to be to our soil and atmosphere. We therefore wonder all the more that a man like Professor Longfellow should not have been deterred by an example so flagrant. Not even the respect we feel for a man of genius who has done good service in the cause of literature, can prevent us from laughing at such a ludicrous attempt at music as the following, which we extract at random from the pages of "Evangeline:"—

Bent like a labouring oar, that toils in the surf of the ocean,
Bent, but not broken, by age was the form of the notary public:
Shocks of yellow hair, like the silken floss of the maize, hung
Over his shoulders; his forehead was high; and glasses with horn bows
Sat astride on his nose, with a look of wisdom supernal.
Father of twenty children was he, and more than a hundred
Children's children rode on his knee, and heard his great watch tick.

Nor will the following excite any other feeling in the mind of any reader who appreciates the beauty of our ordinary English metres:—

Not far withdrawn from these, by the cypress and bee-hives,
Michael the fiddler was placed, with the gayest of hearts and of waistcoats.
Shadow and light from the leaves alternately played on his snow-white
Hair, as it waved in the wind; and the jolly face of the fiddler
Glowed like a living coal, when the ashes are blown from the embers.

There may be some ears upon which the foregoing, as well as the following extract, may sound melodiously, and in harmony with the genius of the language, but we must confess that ours are not of the number.

Then Evangeline lighted the brazen lamp on the table,
Filled, till it overflowed, the pewter tankard with home-brewed
Nut-brown ale that was famed for its strength in the village of Grand Pré;
While from his pocket the notary drew his papers and ink-horn,
Wrote with a steady hand the date and the age of the parties,
Naming the dower of the bride in flocks of sheep and in cattle.

We are aware that a great controversy has arisen upon this subject, and that much has been urged not only in defence but in laudation of English hexameters. We can understand also that the classical predilection of many readers—to whom the rhythm of the ancients has become familiar from long use—may dispose them in favour of the gallant attempt to naturalize it amongst the moderns. But that which was musical to the Greeks and Romans is not necessarily musical to us; we doubt even whether if their music, properly so called—their melodies and harmonies—the airs they played upon the harp and the lyre, had come down to us, like their literature, we should be able to understand them, and find in them the same pleasure that we take in the music which has been the growth of our own circumstances, ideas, habits, and education. The music of a Chinaman is not very pleasing to the ears of an Englishman; and the sounds which may give delight to the people of one nation, may utterly fail in communicating the same feeling to the people of another. Even in the following beautiful passage—beautiful from the phraseology, and in the success of charming pictures which it paints to the mental eye—we are obliged to qualify the admiration we cannot help feeling, by the expression of our regret that the poet has not employed the good old English blank verse—that perfect music, when well written—or any form of Spenserian, heroic, or lyric measure, to clothe his meaning:—

And with these words of cheer they arose and continued their journey.
Softly the evening came. The sun from the western horizon
Like a magician extended his golden wand over the landscape;
Twinkling vapours arose; and sky and water and forest
Seemed all on fire at the touch, and melted and mingled together.
Hanging between two skies, a cloud with edges of silver,
Floated the host with its dipping oars, on the motionless water.
Filled was Evangeline's heart with unspeakable tenderness.
Touched by the magic spell, the sacred fountains of feeling
Glowed with the light of love, as the skies and waters around her.
Then from a neighbouring thicket the mocking-bird—wildest of singers—
Shook from its little throat such floods of delirious music
That the whole air, and the woods, and the waves seemed silent to listen.
Fainter it grew as the tones, and sad; then soaring to madness,
Seemed they to follow or guide the revel of frenzied Bacchantes.
Then single notes were heard, in sorrowful, low lamentation;
Till, having gathered them all, he flung them abroad in derision,
As, when after a storm, a gust of wind through the tree-tops
Shakes down the rattling rain in a crystal shower on the branches.
With such a prelude as this, and hearts that throbbed with emotion,
Slowly they entered the Teche, where it flows through the green Opelousas.
And through the amber air, above the crest of the woodland,
Saw the column of smoke that arose from a neighbouring dwelling;—
Sounds of a horn they heard, and the distant lowing of cattle.

We trust that Professor Longfellow is satisfied with his experiment, and with having done better than any man ever did before him, what no man can ever do well; and that, when he next comes before the public to solicit their admiration for his poetry, he will take no more liberties with our beautiful language; but be contented with the rhythm of Milton and Shakspeare, if he loves blank verse—with that of Spenser and Byron, if he prefers dignity and rhyme in combination—or with the countless forms of the lyric stanza, of which our best poets, from the days of Shakspeare to those of Moore, Shelley, Campbell, and their living successors, offer him so many brilliant examples.

One word as to the present edition. The publisher has lavished all the resources of art upon it, and produced a true livre de luxe for the poet's admirers. It contains no less than forty-five wood-cuts of the very highest merit and beauty. The rural subjects by Mr. B. Foster are perfect gems, and surpass anything of the kind that has lately come under our notice. The engraving, the typography, and the binding are of the first excellence, and reflect the highest credit upon all concerned in the publication.

LIVES OF THE PRINCESSES OF ENGLAND, FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST. By MARY ANNE EVERETT GREEN. 2 vols. Colburn.

The popularity of Miss Strickland's "Lives of the Queens of England," has, in all probability, led the publisher to expect for the present work a co-extensive share of success. There is, however, but little in the lives here chronicled to justify such expectation; though it is not unreasonable to suppose a large class of readers to have calculated upon an amount of interest in these memoirs akin to that of the lives of our female Sovereigns. As Mrs. Green states in her Preface, some of these Royal daughters "have graced foreign Courts, and played an important part abroad;" but this very circumstance renders their memoirs of comparatively slender attraction; more especially as they present but little of that domestic character which is a leading charm of female biography.

The volumes before us comprehend but a portion of Mrs. Green's design; for the lives extend but to that of the sixth daughter of Edward I. Of the five daughters of William the Conqueror, the eldest, Cecilia, dedicated her life to the cloister, and died, Abbess of the Holy Trinity, at Caen. "Many maidens of the noblest houses in Normandy were under her maternal care; for, after the example had been set by William the Conqueror, the Abbey of the Holy Trinity became the favourite resort for those who forsook the allurements of high rank for the seclusion of a monastic life."

Adela, William's youngest daughter, occupies a more prominent place in history than any of her sisters; and her intrepid character and religious zeal have led to many details of her life being preserved with grateful care. After her marriage with Earl Stephen, her benefactions to the Church were very extensive; and, under her pious auspices, the Cathedral of Chartres, which had formerly been an unadorned structure of wood, was built of stone, and in a handsome style of architecture. Her crusading enthusiasm lasted until the infirmities of old age led her from the world to the cloister.

To Gundred, the supposed daughter of the Conqueror, Mrs. Green devotes some ten pages. The interment of her remains in the chapter-house of Lewes is noticed, as is also the discovery of her tomb in Isleld Church, and its removal to St. John's Church, Southover, in 1775. But we are surprised to find no mention whatever of the finding of the bones of Gundred among the remains of the Priory at Lewes—an event rendered extensively known by its copious illustration in this Journal. (See the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for Nov. 8, 1845.)

To these brief notices succeeds a Memoir of Matilda, daughter of Henry I., extending over a hundred pages—an importance which Mrs. Green thus justifies:—

Matilda, the only daughter of Henry I., and Matilda the Atheling, is the first descendant of our Anglo-Norman Sovereigns, who is, strictly speaking, entitled to the name of an English Princess; and on this position which she occupies in the Royalty of England is a peculiar and most important one. Born in England, bleeding in her veins the Norman blood with that of the race of Saxon Monarchs so long and so justly venerated, she was the foundress of a dynasty which swayed the English sceptre for upwards of three centuries, and under whose energetic rule this country was raised to its highest pitch of martial glory: and although the name of Plantagenet has long since been superseded, yet through the Plantagenet Queen of Henry VII., her direct lineal descendant still graces the throne of these realms, in the person of her present Majesty. In Matilda, too, the right of female succession to the English crown was first distinctly acknowledged—an important point, since it is remembered how many of the continental Princes could transmit their dominions through their male descendants only. Though it may be argued that she never was the settled and undisputed Sovereign of England, still the point was gained, which, twice during the infirmities of her father, the assembled barons swore fealty to her as his heiress; and it is to the enterprising ambition of her rival, and still more to her own unyielding haughtiness of character, rather than to any real or even pretended invalidity in her claim, that we must attribute her failure in establishing her title.

At the close of the biography it is noticed, as a singular coincidence—

That no two of the family of Matilda were united in sepulture. Her father, King Henry, was interred in the Abbey of Reading; her mother in that of Westminster; and the billows of the ocean rolled over the unburied bones of her only brother. Her Imperial husband found a proud resting-place among the monuments of his ancestors at Spires, or perchance in the lonely burial-ground of an obscure monastery. Geoffry Plantagenet, the father of her children, was interred in the cathedral of Mons; Geoffry the younger within the city of Nantes; and her youngest son, William, in the cathedral of Rouen. The Empress herself chose the abbey of Bec as her final resting-place, while the bones of her beloved son, King Henry, repose under a stately monument in the abbey of Fontevraud.

Stephen's eldest daughter, Matilda, was betrothed when a cradled infant of two years old, and died a baby-bride. She was interred beside her brother Baldwin, in the Priory of the Holy Trinity, then called Christ's Church, Aldgate. The memory of her dead children was tenderly cherished by their mother, the Queen, who, in 1148, built and endowed the Church and Hospital of St. Katherine's, near the Tower, "in pure and perpetual alms," to secure the repose of the souls of her infants, Baldwin and Matilda. This hospital and its fine church were taken down in 1825, to make way for the present St. Katherine's Docks; the establishment being rebuilt in the Regent's Park.

Mary, the youngest of Stephen's family, from her infancy was destined by her parents for the cloister: she was sent, when a child, to the nunnery of Stratford, but subsequently removed to Lillechurch, where the Lady Mary was installed prioress. The Queen was a frequent visitor here. The Lady Mary subsequently exchanged the convent of Lille Church for the more illustrious one of Romsey, in Hampshire, of which she became abbess—not through Royal influence, but by the free choice of her sisters. Mary married Matthew of Flanders, but she subsequently resumed the veil. Earl Matthew re-married; after which, however, he still spoke of "the Countess Mary his wife." She died, after thirteen years in her second seclusion, and left two daughters—Ida and Matilda; the posterity of the latter succeeding to the Earldom of Boulogne.

Of the three daughters of Henry II., Matilda (the second wife of Henry the Lion) died in her thirty-third year.

Eleanora (Henry's second daughter) was neither English born nor English bred, and passed only a few years of her childhood in England. She married Alphonso the Good, King of Castile, who is said to have been much pleased with the little Leonor—though his delight must have been rather that of a boy, amused with the novelty of his position, and happy in the society of an agreeable playmate, than that of a grave Monarch, gratified to find that his matrimonial speculation had turned out so successfully. Queen Leonor lived to see her only surviving son a King; and her four married daughters each in due time arose to the regal circlet: "so that of the Princess Eleonora it may truly be said, that she was the daughter, sister, wife, mother, and grandmother of Kings, as she was the daughter, sister, wife, mother, and grandmother of Queens, the ancestress of the races of mighty Monarchs who, even now, occupy two of the most powerful thrones of Europe."

Henry's youngest daughter, Joanna, passed her childhood principally in Normandy, where the Royal family at that time resided more frequently than in England. She was partly educated in the monastery of Fontevraud, and manifested great reverence for Thomas-à-Becket, though he died when the Princess was only six years old. At a very early age she married William, King of Sicily, who left her a widow at twenty-four. From her imprisonment by the usurper Tancred she was released by her brother, Richard Cœur de Lion. Fourteen years elapsed between the brother and sister had parted: "the little bride of eleven had grown up into a graceful and dignified woman; while the headstrong and reckless Earl of Poictou, not a whit less reckless than before, had become burdened with the weighty cares of Royalty, though in truth the crown never sat heavily upon the hatefully brow of Richard Cœur de Lion." Eleanora accompanied her brother to the Holy Land. On her return to Europe, she married Raimond of Toulouse. She was soon after attacked with heavy sickness: as the hour of death approached, her conscience became alarmed; she was received as a sister and nun of Fontevraud, and died almost immediately after, in her thirty-fourth year. The subsequent history of Raimond, and his protection of the newly-risen sect, the Albigenses, forms a very interesting episode in this portion of the work.

"We have traced," says Mrs. Green, "the splendid destinies of the daughters of the enterprising and ambitious Henry II., all of whom were wooed to occupy the most brilliant positions; but for otherwise was with the unfortunate Princesses whose fates depended on the policy of King John, or the all but imbecile weakness of his son and successor, Henry III."

Joanna, the first of these Princesses, and the eldest daughter of John by his beautiful wife, Isabella of Angoulême, was betrothed, when a child, to Hugh de Lusignan, the eldest son of the Earl of March, the former suitor of Queen Isabella; to her, on the death of John, she was married, notwithstanding the anomalous position he occupied as her intended son-in-law. The letter of Isabella to her young son, King Henry III., announcing her second marriage, and her reasons for substituting herself for her daughter as the bride of the gallant Lusignan, is still preserved in the Tower of London, and is a most curious specimen of diplomatic skill and woman's finesse.

Joanna was married to Alexander II., King of Scotland: she died early, of consumption, and was buried, according to her own request, at the nunnery of Tarente, in Dorsetshire, where a marble tomb and continually burning tapers were set up to her memory.

Isabella, John's second daughter, when scarcely five years old, had her suite of servants; for, in 1219, Henry III. granted one penny per day to Margaret, her nurse, which was to be paid every day by the hands of the Viscount of Hertford. "Paltry as this sum may appear at the present day, yet, if we multiply it by 16, which, according to recent computation (Hardy's 'Introduction to the Close Rolls'), is the proportion which the money of our time bears to that of the period in question, we shall find that her wages amounted to 8s. 9d. per week, or nearly £23 a year." Mrs. Green adds:—

The attention paid by our Monarchs of the olden time to those who had tended their childhood, brings us back in imagination to the tender simplicity of patriarchal days. King John gave fourpence a day to the nurse of his son Richard, and twopence per diem was given to the nurse of his brother, Richard the Lion-hearted; and King Henry followed the example, by giving fourpence and then twopence more per day to "our dear nurse Elena," as well as an allowance of fire-wood from the Royal forests. Entries also occur for Isabella's cook, valet, and other servants, several of whom were pensioned off in their later years by her brother.

Isabella was married to the Emperor Frederic II.; though Mrs. Green tells us, as a curious fact which has hitherto escaped observation, that ten years previously negotiations had been made for her marriage with the Emperor's son, Henry, King of Germany. This appears from a letter in the Tower collection, written by the Bishop of Carlisle to Henry III. In 1234 she became an inmate of the Tower of London, which in this reign first became a frequent Royal residence, instead of a mere fortress. "The chapel of the White Tower was then used for the Royal household.

Our olden chronicles glow with details of the splendour of the marriage of Isabella with Frederic, who proved faithless and profligate. She died at Naples, much to the grief of King Henry, to judge by the amount of his benefactions in memory of her—affording food to upwards of 101,000 paupers, at a cost, according to the proportional value of money in our day, of £6315.

Of Eleanora, John's third daughter, the memoir is unusually copious: her early marriage to William de Mareshal, Earl of Pembroke, and her subsequent union with Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, are the leading events in her career, by no means an unimportant one. The domestic history of this memoir is likewise very attractive; the pictures of the Earl of Leicester's courtly splendour at Kenilworth are minutely painted: his retainers numbered 140 among his domestic servants only; and a curious picture of the household economy of the period exists in a roll of the Countess Eleanora, which has lately been found in an obscure French monastery, where it had lain for centuries, and has been purchased for the British Museum. "This document, one of the most ancient of the kind now in existence, is written on a roll of parchment about 20 feet in length, and one foot in width, and is still in excellent preservation."

After Kenilworth passed into the hands of the Royalists, Eleanora fell a prey to despondency, and retired to the nunnery of Montargis, where she is stated to have died.

Margaret, Beatrice, and Katherine, the three daughters of Henry III., are next portrayed; their personal history being aided by some interesting pictures of the times, yet too minute for quotation.

The remainder of the work is occupied with the lives of the six daughters of Edward I. Of these, Mary, the youngest, became a nun at Ambresbury, in Wiltshire, when seven years old; the chronicle telling us that she was veiled nun by her great-aire, Edward, King of England, at the wish of her grandmother, the Queen Eleanora, and by the assent of the Lady Eleanora, her mother. Her consecration was witnessed by the King and Queen, and the whole of the Royal family, even including the infant Prince Edward, with many of the principal Earls, Barons, Archbishops, Bishops, and Abbots of the realm; thirteen young ladies of noble birth being selected as the companions of Mary. Of the conventual life of the period, this memoir presents several glimpses. She is presumed to have died in the year 1332. "She was at this time," writes Mrs. Green, "in her fifty-fourth year, and was the longest liver, as well as the last survivor, of the family of Edward I. and Eleanora of Castile. She outlived her brother, Edward II., six years, and her sister Margaret, the next to herself in longevity, fourteen years. Mary was interred in the monastery which for forty-eight years had been her principal abode. The hand of Time has been heavy upon this structure; and a picturesque ruin, with its mantle of ivy and wreath of wild flowers, is all that now remains to point out the spot which was at once the abode and the tomb of the nun Princess." Ambresbury, by the way, tells us that the last Abbess of Ambresbury was a Kirton—who was 140 years old when she dyed;" she was great-aunt to Mr. Child, Rector of Yatton Keynell, from whom Aubrey had this information; and he adds, "Mr. Child, the eminent banker in Fleet-street, is Baron Child's cozen-german."

Throughout these volumes, there is abundant evidence of laborious research to ensure authenticity; as well as of the care "bestowed upon the verification of names, dates, genealogies, and other points of historic importance." In the second volume there is, perhaps, a superabundance of detail from household expenses, which, notwithstanding their popular interest, are but the properties of historical writing, and should be employed sparingly; and should likewise be accompanied with elucidation, if the object be to enlighten the reader upon the actual life of the period. Of such aid Mrs. Green has availed herself in some instances, especially as regards the comparative value of money; but this illustrative plan has not been carried out so fully as it might advantageously be. Of technical errors there occur a few; such, for example, as the mistaking of Vicecomes, the ancient county sheriff, for Viscount, a title of recent date.

In the succeeding volumes of Mrs. Green's work, it is reasonable to expect that the interest will be increased in proportion to the multiplicity of the illustrative stores which it is a favourite pursuit of the present age to render available to the historian and biographer.

VIEWS OF NATURE; OR, CONTEMPLATIONS ON THE SUBLIME PHENOMENA OF CREATION. With Scientific Illustrations. By ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. Translated from the German by E. C. OTTE and H. G. BOHN. Bohn.

The records of physical science present few parallels to the fact of a philosopher in his eighticth year calmly sitting down to revise a labour of half a century since; and, by the exercise of a vivid memory through this long vista of years, remoulding his work to meet the demands of the age. Yet such is the sublime picture which Baron Humboldt presents in the volume before us.

The "views" originated in a series of detached fragments written amidst the noblest objects of Nature—on the ocean—in the forests of the Orinoco, in the savannahs of Venezuela, and in the solitudes of the Peruvian and Mexican mountains. This æsthetic mode of treating subjects of Natural History, Humboldt admits to be fraught with great difficulties—in the wonderful luxuriance of Nature presenting an accumulation of separate images, and thus disturbing the harmony and effect of a picture. Yet this want of unity has not interfered with the philosopher's main object in these essays—to direct the reader's attention to the perpetual influence which physical nature exercises on the moral condition and on the destiny of man. "It is to minds oppressed with care," says Humboldt, "that these pages are especially consecrated. He who has escaped from the stormy waves of life, will joyfully follow me into the depths of the forest—over the boundless steppes and prairies, and to the lofty summits of the Andes."

As the enjoyment of the immediate contemplation of Nature is heightened by an insight into the connexion of the occult forces, Humboldt has subjoined to his "Views" scientific illustrations and additions, nearly all of which have been either enlarged or replaced by new and more comprehensive ones in the edition before us, dated from Berlin, in the spring of last year.

The work opens with an eloquent chapter on "Steppes and Deserts," those treeless wastes and seas of sand, which present phenomena at every turn. It would require more space than we can devote for the purpose to instance the fervid eloquence of the text, or the scientific wealth of the notes and illustrations; though a few points of popular interest may be selected, for the reader's gratification.

Among the results of Humboldt's long life, not the least gratifying is the confirmation of his views by contemporary observers; as in the case of his opinions on the much-disputed Mar de Sargasse, which the late Major Rennell confirmed by many new observations. The Sargasso Sea of the older writers Humboldt states to consist of two groups of sea-weed, which, with the transverse band uniting them, occupy an area equal to six or seven times that of Germany.

In a note on "Herds of Wild Dogs" occurs the following:—

Von Tschudi makes the singular remark, that on the Cordilleras, at elevations of more than 12,000 feet, delicate breeds of dogs, and the European domestic cat, are exposed to a particular kind of mental disease. "Innumerable attempts have been made to keep cats as domestic animals in the town of Cerro de Pasco (lying at an elevation of 14,100 feet above the sea's level), but such endeavours have invariably been frustrated, as both cats and dogs have died in convulsions at the end of a few days. The cats, after being attacked by convulsive fits, attempt to climb the walls, but soon fall to the ground exhausted and motionless. I frequently observed instances in Cuzil of this chorea-like disease; and it seems to arise from insufficient atmospheric pressure."

A vulgar error respecting the lion in the desert is thus corrected:—

"That lions exist in the desert," says M. Carette, "is a myth popularised by the dreams of artists and poets, and has no foundation but in their imagination. This animal does not quit the mountains, where it finds shelter, food, and drink. When the traveller questions the natives concerning those wild beasts, which he deems rightly to be their companions in the desert, they reply, with imperturbable sang froid, 'Have you, then, lions in your country which can drink air and eat leaves? With us, lions require running water and living flesh; and, therefore, rarely appear where there are wooded hills and water. We fear only the viper (leyla), and, in humid spots, the innumerable swarms of mosquitoes which abound there."

The following passage on the "Analogies of Language" is striking:—

We know, as yet, too little of the languages of America, entirely to renounce the hope that, amid their many varieties, some idiom may be discovered that has been spoken, with certain modifications, in the interior of South America and Central Asia, or that might at least indicate an ancient affinity. Such a discovery would, undoubtedly, be one of the most brilliant to which the history of the human mind can hope to attain! Such analogies of language are only deserving of confidence when mere resemblances of sound in the roots are not alone the object of research, but attention is also directed to the organic structure, the grammatical forms, and those elements of language which manifest themselves as the product of the intellectual power of Man.

In the chapter on the "Cataracts of the Orinoco" it is related—

There is a legend amongst the Guarake Indians, that the brave Atures, when closely pursued by the cannibal Caribs, took refuge on the rocks of the cataracts—a mournful place of abode, in which this oppressed race perished, together with its language! In the most inaccessible portion of the fearful, other graves of the same character are met with; indeed, it is probable that the last descendants of the Atures did not become extinct until a much more recent period. There still lives—and it is a singular fact—an old parrot in Maypures which cannot be understood, because, as the natives assert, it speaks the language of the Atures!

"The sources of the Orinoco have never been visited by any European." Thus wrote Humboldt in the year 1807, and he repeats with equal truth the same statement after an interval of forty-one years; the problem having been only partially solved by Sir Richard Schomburgk.

From an extensive accumulation of Illustrative Notes to the remaining papers we select a few facts:—

The Chinchilla.—The opinion prevalent in Europe, that the beautiful rodent, the Chinchilla, whose soft and glossy fur is so much esteemed, is found in the highest mountain regions of Chili, is an error. The Chinchilla laniger (Gray) lives only in a mild lower zone, and does not advance further south than the parallel of 30°.

The Humming-bird and the Condor.—The region which may be regarded as the common resort of the Condor, begins at the elevation of Mount Etna. It embraces atmospheric zones which are from 9,000 feet to 15,000 feet above the level of the sea. Humming-birds were seen by Von Tschudi in Puna, at an elevation of 14,600 feet. There is a pleasure in comparing the largest and the smallest of the feathered inhabitants of the air. The largest among the Condors found in the Cordilleras, near Quito, measure nearly 15 feet across the expanded wings, and the smaller ones 8½ feet. This size, and the visual angle at which the birds are seen vertically above one's head, afford an idea of the enormous height to which the Condor soars in a clear sky. A visual angle of four minutes, for instance, would give a vertical elevation of 7330 feet. The cavern (Mackay) of Antisana, opposite the mountain of Chussulongo, and where we measured the birds soaring over the chain of the Andes, lies at an elevation of nearly 16,000 feet above the surface of the Pacific; the absolute height which the Condor reached must, therefore, be 23,773 feet—a height at which the barometer scarcely stands at 12·7 inches! But which, however, does not exceed that of the loftiest summit of the Himalayas. It is a remarkable physiological phenomenon that the same bird, which wheels for hours together through these highly rarefied regions, should be able suddenly, as, for instance, on the western declivity of the volcano of Pichincha, to descend to the sea-shore, and thus, in the course of a few hours, traverse, as it were, all climates. At heights of 23,000 feet and upwards, the membranes of the eyes of the Condor undergo a remarkable degree of inflation after being filled in lower regions of the atmosphere. This bird probably raises itself voluntarily to a greater height from the surface of our earth than any other living creature. It has the expression of "voluntarily," since small insects and siliceous-shelled infusoria are frequently borne to greater elevations by a rising current of air. It is probable that the Condor flies even higher than the above calculations would appear to show.

The transparency of the mountain air is so great under the Equator, that, in the province of Quito, the white cloak (poncho) of a horseman may be distinguished with the naked eye at a horizontal distance of 89,664 feet, and therefore under an angle of thirteen seconds. At this distance, Humboldt saw his friend Bonpland moving along a black rocky precipice on the volcano of Pichincha.

Of the merits of this translation, and the care taken to adapt it for popular reading, we can scarcely speak too highly. The principal Latin, French, and Spanish quotations are translated; and all the foreign measurements are converted into English. A copious summary of contents and index complete the means of ready reference.

The frontispiece is a view of Chimborazo, from a sketch by Humboldt, printed in colours, the vertical height of this mountain is, according to our author's measurement, 21,422 feet. If we could suppose the pass of St. Gothard, Mount Athos, or the Righi piled on the summit of the Chimborazo, we should have the elevation which is at present ascribed to the Dhawalagiri, in the Himalaya.

ON THE CAUSES OF THE SUCCESS OF THE ENGLISH REVOLUTION, 1640—1688. By M. GUIZOT. London: Murray.

No man of the position, attainments, and antecedents of M. Guizot can write upon such a subject as the history and philosophy of revolution, without commanding for his work the respectful attention of thinkers and politicians. The very faults of character which unfitted him for playing a successful part in the great drama of contemporary history, the austerity, the obstinate impracticability, the severe judgment of men and things, and the stern unflinching devotion, amid the noisy and conflicting concerns of the busy world, to the theories formed in the quiet and seclusion of the closet, qualify him for passing a cool and impartial judgment upon the past. The living age is not sufficiently durable for statesmen of his class and temperament to worship the pure reason, and ignore the passions of their fellow-creatures; but the facts of history, bloodless and impassible as time has made them, yield their more ready obedience. The theorist can shape them with facility into the forms which he may desire. Thus, whilst as a statesman M. Guizot is great in nothing but his obstinacy, and little in the parliament, he is very respectable, and valuable as a historian. His philosophy does not lead him astray when he deals with the dead past. He revives it in the light of his clear and passionless intellect, traces events to their causes with unerring sagacity, and draws the true moral from bygone revolutions. His own sufferings have sharpened his apprehension—he sees the past through the microscope of his personal experience in the present—and, bringing a naturally acute and well-trained mind, and a most laborious, pains-taking, and conscientious industry to bear upon every subject that passes under his review, he presents the result of his investigations in a manner as clear and as convincing as the solution of a mathematical problem. To this praise M. Guizot is fairly entitled. His "Lectures upon European Civilization" are masterpieces of historical philosophy: his "Democracy in France" is no less able, searching, and exhaustive of the important question of which it treats. His present work is worthy of his literary fame, and will be read with profit and instruction, not only by the great English public, to whom the facts touched upon are familiar in all their phases, but by the larger public of his own and other European countries, by whom they are still but partially known, or imperfectly understood, and who need, in this hour of change, perplexity, tribulation, and peril, the high lesson that they teach.

The work is not of great extent. It is merely, as its second title sets forth, "a discourse, designed as an introduction to the history of the reign of Charles I.;" but, though introductory, it is complete in itself. M. Guizot presents his subject in the following terms:—

The success by which the English Revolution was crowned has not only been permanent, but has borne a double fruit: the author has founded representative Monarchy in England; and in America, their descendants founded the Republic of the United States. These great events are now completely known and understood; time, which has given them its sanction, has also shed over them its light. Sixty years ago France entered on the path opened by England, and Europe lately rushed headlong in the same direction. It is my purpose to show what are the causes which have crowned Constitutional Monarchy in England, and Republican Government in the United States, with that solid and lasting success which France and the rest of Europe are still vainly pursuing, through those mysterious trials and revolutionary struggles which, according as they are well or ill passed through, elevate or pervert the nation for ages.

It was in the name of Religion and liberty of conscience that the conflict which began in the sixteenth century—and, though occasionally suspended, has been constantly renewed—was undertaken. The tempest which still agitates the world, or hurries it along in an impetuous torrent, gathered in the inmost recesses of men's minds, and burst over the Church before it reached the State.

It has been said that the Protestantism was a political rather than a religious revolution—an insurrection of worldly interests against the established order of the Church, rather than the outbreak of an ardent conviction concerning the eternal interests of man. This judgment has been superficially formed, and lightly pronounced; and the error on which it rests has led the powers, whether spiritual or temporal, who have adopted it, into a line of conduct fatal to their own security. Intent on repressing the revolutionary element of Protestantism, they have overlooked or misunderstood its religious element. The spirit of revolt is doubtless very powerful, but not powerful enough to accomplish, alone and unaided, things of such magnitude. It was not merely to shake off a yoke, it was also to cause its free profession and practice of a faith, that the Reformers of the sixteenth century rose up against authority, and persevered in the conflict. This is demonstrated by a decisive and incontestable fact. The most Protestant countries—Switzerland, England and Holland, are still the countries in which the Christian faith has the greatest vital energy and power. It betrays a strange ignorance of human nature to believe that religious zeal would have remained at such a pitch of elevation, after the successful termination of the revolt, if religion had not been the mainspring of the whole movement.

The revolution which took place in Germany, in the sixteenth century, was religious and not political; that in France, in the eighteenth, was political and not religious. It was the peculiar felicity of England in the seventeenth century, that the spirit of religious faith and the spirit of political liberty reigned together, and that she entered upon the two revolutions at the same time. All the great passions of the human soul were thus excited and brought into action, while some of the most powerful restraints by which they are controlled remained unbroken; and the hopes and aspirations of eternity remained to console and tranquillise those whose earthly hopes and ambitions had suffered shipwreck.

An idea, the reader will ask, were in M. Guizot's opinion the causes of the success of the English Revolution? His discourse is one long reply to the question; but he sums it up himself in a few sentences, at the conclusion of his Essay:—

England (he says) endured much, and struggled long, to avoid a second revolution; but did she resign herself to it? She saw on the one hand her ancient rights, her honour, and her faith. It is the glory of the Revolution of 1688, and the main cause of its success, that it was an act of mere defence and of necessary defence. Whilst this revolution was defensive in principle, it aimed at precise and limited objects. Its great political and social conviction, its fever of boundless and impious ambition sometimes seizes upon society; men think themselves entitled to lay hands upon everything, and to remodel the world at their will. These vague and presumptuous schemes of human creatures treating the great and complex system in which their place is marked out as if it were a chaos, and striving to exalt themselves into creators, are as impotent as they are insane: the utmost that they can do is to throw all that they touch into the confusion of their own delirious dreams. England did not fall into this wild error. Instead of aspiring to alter the foundation of society and the destinies of mankind, she asserted and maintained her religion and her positive laws and rights, and did not carry her claims, or even her desires, beyond the limits which they prescribed. With a singular mixture of magnanimity and discretion, she accomplished a revolution which gave to the country a new head and new guarantees, but which stopped short with the attainment of those objects. This great change was not brought about by popular risings, but by political parties, organized long before the revolution, with a view to the settlement of a regular Government, and not in a revolutionary spirit. Neither the one party nor that of the Whigs (spite of the revolutionary elements which mingled in it) had been formed for the purpose of overthrowing established institutions. They were parties occupied with constitutional politics, not with conspiracy and revolt. Although they were led by imperious circumstances to change the government of their country, the design was foreign to their character and principles, and they returned with little regret to the ordinary course of affairs, when the object they had abandoned for a moment, not from taste or levity, but from necessity. Nor was the merit or the burden of the revolution limited to either of the great parties which had been so long opposed to each other. They were in about an equal, and by mutual concessions. It was imposed on both by a common necessity, and was not, to either, a victory or a defeat. Though watching its approach with widely-different opinions, both saw it to be inevitable, and shared its accomplishment.

M. Guizot is right. The English people, when they made a revolution, knew what they wanted. They acted with their eyes open, and with a clear understanding, both of their actual position, and of the changes which their revolution would operate. It is with no wish to disparage the French and their revolutions, that we would point out, in few words than M. Guizot has employed—but in the same spirit, and with the same meaning—that the three great revolutions of the French have failed, because the French did not know what they wanted, and because they entered upon the boundless and stormy ocean of change, without any clear idea whether there was land in it or not. Experience, however, will be their teacher. They have learned something from their past misery; and they, as well as other continental nations, will discover in due time, that construction, not destruction, must be the great end and object of communities that overthrow their rulers. The French, as yet, have shown no aptitude for the former; and in their blind fury have destroyed, not simply their existing institutions, but the very materials for raising up new ones. M. Guizot reads this lesson to his countrymen, not obtrusively or impertinently, but quietly and forcibly, in almost every page of his work; and in so doing acts the part of a public benefactor. France has yet much to learn from the History of England; and M. Guizot, the historian and philosopher, may, in his literary retirement, make some amends to his country for his errors as a statesman—errors which, if they did not actually cause, most indubitably precipitated a revolution—by warning the existing generation of Frenchmen of the quicksands and shoals in the dangerous navigation on which they have entered. We regret we have not space for many further extracts from this interesting work, more especially for the brilliant sketches of the characters of Charles I., Charles II., James II., and William III.; and for the masterly portraits of Oliver Cromwell, and the sturdy Puritans and Republicans of that remarkable era. There is no quotation, however, which we cannot make from the entrance into the court, where six of them form an archway under which a carriage may pass."

"But the curtains—you say he is curtained?"

"Yes—at least to those who have not seen many very old houses. I was astonished at the thickness of the walls, especially the partition wall between the staircase and the kitchen, which is nine feet thick. The stairs, too, are remarkably narrow, for the house was built in the ancient times part of a friary, and Sir Walter made very few alterations in it. There is, I am told, some remarkable oak carving over the drawingroom fireplace of early date, but unfortunately there, over the fireplace, hangs the daughter of the resident possessor was L1, and we could not be admitted beyond the parlour, which is a long low room with three deep windows, nearly the same now, we were told, as when Sir Walter resided there, perhaps the only room in the original, at least the most preserved, part of his life, when far from all the torments and excitements of ambition and rivalry, and before he had become the object of the injustice of party strife and the malevolence of his enemies."

"I must read his history again," said Evelyn.

"Then I recommend his life by Francis," said Mrs. Manvers. "It is excessively interesting; and the character of the times is well depicted, I think."

The sight of a swarm of bees during the ladies' walk, suggests a variety of anecdotes of the wonderful insects; when Mrs. Manvers relates how, in Cachmere, where honey forms an important part of rural economy, the farmers usually establish their bees in their own dwelling-houses, and in a very peculiar manner, so that even as many as ten hives have been known to be in one house.

Then succeeds a chapter of family history, a walk to a corn-field, and to a school-house in progress; and next, a visit to the Widow Green. A visit to Lady Crowsdale, and the Guayana museum of her son, a young traveller, fills a chapter very advantageously. This is followed by a chapter on Bible history, appropriate for Sunday reading. We must not, however, attempt further enumeration: the "chivalry" of the past, and the "emigration" of the present, is a range wide as time to us to scan; and the above rapid glance at the contents of this home treasury will suffice to recommend it to the attention of readers of every growth.

SOCIALISM UNMASKED: a plain Lecture, from the French of CHARLES GOURARD. Slater.

In every civilised society, and more even in France than in England, there are found mingled with its happier and more prosperous portions vast masses of misery and poverty and wickedness. Something of the kind has ever been, and has in all ages brought forth lamentations and stimulated exertions. Such a condition seems the lot of humanity, and probably serves the purpose of arousing kindly sympathies and urging on continual improvement. There is always found, however, a great many ambitious men, political knaves, designing demagogues and intriguers, who endeavour to turn to their own profit the wretchedness of one portion of our species, as well as a great number of honest enthusiasts, who, without adequate knowledge, devise and try to enforce plans to improve it. While we carefully discriminate between the motives of these classes, we are desirous of the latter and condemning those of the former, we must be sensible that both have what is called Socialism for their object, and we must not allow ourselves to be led away from real improvement by their usurpation of the name. Socialism, properly understood, in the sense which many good and great men attach to the word, is perfect society. It is the full and honest performance of the duty of every one man to his neighbour. It is a short name for all the mutual services that men must and do perform for each other to live happily together. It is one term for all the social virtues. Genuine Socialism needs no unmasking, for it is no sham and no hypocrisy. But certain schemers have pretended they know how to make society perfect—that Nature has by some unaccountable mistake, though she has determined the consequences of every action, forgotten to prescribe the duties and determine the rights of individuals, and they undertake to prescribe them. It is some of these presumptuous, ambitious, political knaves whom M. Gourard unmasks; it is the men who call themselves Socialists exclusively—as if we were not all of necessity Socialists—that he exposes; and he does not take from us that idea or hope of social improvement, which all good and great men entertain.

He shews, for example, the folly and impiety of M. Proudhon, who says "God is evil; God withdraw thyself (Dieu retire-toi)"—a terrible kind of blasphemy, considering that in God, who is everywhere, "we live and move and have our being;" only to be discriminated from utter madness, by knowing that in France, and some other countries, the name of the Deity has long been taken in vain, and that the God M. Proudhon bids to withdraw is the imaginary being whom certain men have made, after their own hearts, for their own selfish purposes. So his palpable contradiction, or, rather, his nonsensical assertion, "that property is robbery," which is like saying that a square is round, assumes only the property which is extorted from the French by taxation with a black handkerchief, on account of a slight cut which I had received from a hussar a few days before; my white cloak covered with spots, gray, black, brown, and yellow, mantled with streaks of blood, in those with sword cuts, balls, and firebrands of the bivouac; the tschako cut through and bent; instead of the neat tschismen (hussar boots), clumsy fishermen's boots over the trowsers. And the black and yellow sash stripped of its fringe; my sword, from the many strokes that it has dealt and parried, is full of notches and covered with rusty blood-stains.

A bivouac is thus cleverly described:—

Shoving my saddle under my head, wrapping myself in a woollen coverlet, I lay down by the watch-fire to contemplate the scene about me. Above, the dark wintry firmament, with its sparkling stars, reddened in the distance by the glare of a conflagration, such as we saw almost every day—for Kossuth's hands burned in their retreat many dwellings, and even whole villages inhabited by Germans and Honvés—in a wide circle around me, our horses completely covered with their warm clothes, either stretched at full length, or feeding out of their nose-bags, part of them of course saddled and bridled, ready at the first signal to bear their riders against the enemy. Near me, tinged by the bright blazing fire, the dancing hussars, in their white cloaks—all hale fellows—with dark, expressive countenances, black eyes, and the lower part of the face covered with a thick black beard. Add to all this, the tones of the gipsy music, which was not amiss—and the shouting, the singing, the snapping, the clattering of wine. At a distance were heard occasionally the cry of our videttes; and here and there, from the recesses of the woods, the howling of wolves, which are still tolerably numerous in Hungary. About midnight my order put an end to the scene—the men could not be allowed to waste their strength to no purpose: and all whose duty did not keep them waking were soon stretched by the watch-fire, sleeping the sound sleep of the weary, which the soldier always does on the field.

THE HEIRESS IN HER MINORITY; OR, THE PROGRESS OF CHARACTER. By the Author of "Bertha's Journal." 2 vols. Murray.

All who remember how quietly the pleasant little "Journal" of Bertha won its way to the favour of those who provide books for the young, and will expect a like store in these two volumes of some thousand pages; filled to overflowing with sketches of interesting objects and picturesque scenery, narratives of events and circumstances worth remembering, entertaining explanations of striking phenomena of nature and curious works of art, brief discourses upon Scriptural passages, anecdotes of remarkable persons, precepts in the form of pleasantry, and glances at original and antiquities and philological puzzles—which give the book the character of a little cyclopædia, just fitted to gratify the curiosity of intelligent inquirers. The moral of the book is to show how self-control may be practically developed in a young and ardent mind, when brought under the influence of high and noble motives. The form of the work is that of a Journal; the form of the work is conversational, and the characters are purely imaginary. This kind of framework has of late years become somewhat out of favour: in skilful hands it is, however, the most attractive form of communicating information to the young. We can only spare room for one specimen of the manner of the book. Evelyn, who is the "heiress in her minority," and Mrs. Manvers, her friend and neighbour, are walking in the neighbourhood of Youghal, when the conversation turns upon the introduction of the potato into Ireland, which Mrs. Manvers regards as a fortunate circumstance for the country.

"But," replied Evelyn, "I have heard Mr. Stanley and others say that its being brought to Ireland was unfortunate, as it encourages laziness."

"That objection is easily made," said Mrs. Manvers, "but I cannot agree to it. I have seen so many instances of the poor man enjoying the comfort of his store of potatoes, when perhaps he could not have managed to cultivate enough of any other crop to support his family, that I shall still rejoice in their possession of that most excellent vegetable. Many rich landlords have endeavoured to add to the comforts of the people by causing them to build better houses, and to cultivate useful grain, and whenever I hear an instance of such exertion I respect them for it: but for my part I shall always consider Sir Walter Raleigh, 'the benefactor to the Cessna,' as a greater public character than he was one of our benefactors: and the little garden at Youghal, where the first potato grew in Ireland, seemed to me a sacred spot that should be dear to all my countrymen."

"You have been at Youghal, then, and have seen the myrtles of which I have heard?"

"Yes, both in the garden and against Sir Walter's ancient house, which is a greater curiosity than the myrtles, for they grow luxuriantly near the sea in various parts of Ireland, or even than the vaulted arch at the entrance into the court, where six of them form an archway under which a carriage may pass."

"But the curtains—you say he is curtained?"

"Yes—at least to those who have not seen many very old houses. I was astonished at the thickness of the walls, especially the partition wall between the staircase and the kitchen, which is nine feet thick. The stairs, too, are remarkably narrow, for the house was built in the ancient times part of a friary, and Sir Walter made very few alterations in it. So his palpable contradiction, or, rather, his nonsensical assertion, "that property is robbery," which is like saying that a square is round, assumes only the property which is extorted from the French by taxation and law. The stern logic of M. Proudhon, and his bitter sarcasms, are all based on the utterly false assumptions or principles of other men, to which he and they alike give the sacred names of God and property.

M. Gouraud, in like manner, unmasks the Phalangeriate, who, in complete opposition to the fact that the two sexes are born in about equal numbers, and in opposition to all our feelings, propose "polygamy as the most precious germ of family union." He unmasks, too, the Socialist clubs of Paris, headed by Barbès and Blanqui, who propose, as the means of happiness, a Committee of Safety with unbounded power—that is, a bloody despotism. He unmasks also those foolish men who, like Louis Blanc, would organize labour, not seeing that labour is now organized in every part of society, dovetailing one operation into another, in China, in the United States, and in England, in a marvellous manner far surpassing human wisdom to devise—and give the idle and the blundering, in complete contradiction to the natural laws of society, an equal reward with the industrious and the skilful. So M. Gouraud exposes the foolishness or the knavery of many of the men, who, in these latter times, particularly in France, have taken advantage of the great distress of the poor to propound nostrums of their own, and have not hesitated in the madness of ambition to propose to carry them by force into effect, to the terror and almost ruin of society. Well does he say of the schemes of such men who have written Socialism on their banner, that the "very name is a lie." For a plain, short, and forcible exposure of their absurdities, M. Gouraud deserves public approbation; but we must not be diverted from the steady pursuit of improvement, by the follies of the ignorant enthusiasts, or the wickedness of the political knaves, who see in the miseries of many of our fellow-creatures only the means of advancing their own foolish or sordid ends.

THE JUVENILE CALENDAR; OR, ZODIAC OF FLOWERS. A Gift-Book. By MRS. T. K. HERVEY. Hall, Virtue, and Co.

This is an elegant book for children, in which a higher object is achieved than is sought to be effected by works of this class. First, we have twelve illustrations of the months from the poetic pencil of Mr. Richard Doyle; appended to each of which is a little fairy tale, with its legend and moral from the face of Nature during the month. Accompanying these twelve fancies are notes on the natural history of the month, with a list of flowers and herbs, yet so few as not to overburthen the memory of the young reader. There is a playful fancy throughout the illustrations which is very charming; whilst the legends are in the true poetic spirit by which Nature is distinguished in each month of the year. Yet, there is a tasteful simplicity which must successfully woo the youthful heart to its delights, whilst it wins the older one with recreation from graver pursuits. It is no easy task to combine in the same page attraction for young and old; yet, in the volume before us, we find it gracefully accomplished.

DOD'S PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, AND KNIGHTAGE FOR 1850. Whittaker and Co.

The return of the parliamentary season has brought with it a new edition of this well-known standard work, which contains several additions and improvements. Amongst these we may mention the additional notices rendered necessary by the large number of individuals who have been added to the several ranks of the aristocracy; the many translations that have taken place amongst the Bishops, and the Judges who have resigned and been replaced, &c., since the publication of the last edition. The article on Precedence, also, has been much augmented and improved, and additional particulars have been obtained respecting many individuals who have been hitherto briefly noticed. The latest facts have been recorded respecting every Peer, every Peeress (including the Dowager Peeresses who derive their titles from extinct families), every Bishop, English, Irish, Scottish, and Colonial; every Lord of the Court of Session; every Baronet of England, Ireland, and Scotland; every member of the Privy Council of Great Britain and Ireland, every Knight of the Bath, every Knight of St. Michael and St. George, every Knight Bachelor of Great Britain and of Ireland, and every person who by courtesy bears the prefix of Lord, Lady, or Honourable.

Altogether, the work is a very perfect compendium of the varied details of the state of the peerage. It is one without interfering with larger works of greater pretension of the same kind, it forms quite a handbook of useful knowledge on matters pertaining to the aristocracy and gentry of the country.

DOD'S PARLIAMENTARY COMPANION FOR 1850. Whittaker and Co. This excellent little manual, in its present new edition, enters the eighteenth year of its existence, and the extent of alterations caused by the lapse of a year has rendered such a complete revision of the whole work necessary, that the present edition must be considered as a new publication, though its continued accuracy will, it is hoped, still entitle it to the character of an old favourite.

Among the features of the new edition are these:—That part of the volume devoted to Constituencies has undergone a more minute revision than any other portion of the work, and now exhibits the number of registered electors and £10 householders entitled to vote according to the latest Parliamentary returns. Under the head of Parliamentary Terms will be found an account of those alterations in the conduct of Parliamentary proceedings which were effected in the course of last Session. Eighteen members wholly new to Parliament, or not included in the previous edition, have been elected, and a corresponding number have retired from Parliament, or have died; and the various other changes of the year have been carefully and ably noticed.

WHO'S WHO IN 1850? Bally Brothers.

THIS is a kind of little "Red-book," and analysis of our bulky works on the Peerage. It contains: Lists of the Royal Family and Household; Ministers and Officers of State; Privy Councils and Houses of Parliament; the Nobility of the United Kingdom: their title, rank, age, family-name, and heir; lists of the Judges, the Clergy, Baronage and Knightage; Naval and Military Officers; Ecclesiastical Dignitaries; Civic Authorities; Commercial Lists, &c. This little book will be found an almost indispensable companion to the library-table, for the leading information it presents within the least possible compass.

MUSICAL REVIEW.

SONGS OF THE HUNGARIAN VOCALISTE, WITH THE ORIGINAL WORDS. The English Version by G. LINLEY, Esq. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

AN elegant volume has been got up in a very superior style, containing five songs, two duets, and six glees, of sterling original and national music, brought within the range of ordinary voices for the drawing-room. Pagnani, on being asked by the noblemen at the Catch Club his opinion of our English glees and singing, replied, that he greatly admired the music, but found fault with the tameness of the execution. The Hungarian Vocalists,—whose debût at the Musical Union were noticed in the columns of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS last season—satisfied the most fastidious by their marked and charming contrasts of light and shade; and their rich, powerful voices, in the more vigorous passages, gradually modified into a mere whisper—their crescendo and sforzando—gave a charm to their vocalisation that never palled.

The No. 1, "My Bonnie Girl," a delicious strain, worthy of Schubert, is beautifully pathetic; it is also published, as we remember hearing it, as a tenor solo, with four-part harmony sustained by two tenors and two basses on the accompaniable "ah!"—an excellent solfeggio exercise. No. 2, "Hush'd in death the Minstrel lies," a known and admired melody, is adapted to words appropriate to the occasion when it was sung by the choirs at the funeral of its lamented composer, Mendelssohn. Mr. Linley has well executed his task, in the expression of which, "sublime, indeed, now sympathizes with the lofty theme." No. 3, "The Moon so stilly calm," is descriptive and expressive—it is by Braun: the Hungarians produced a thrilling effect in the dissonance at its close. No. 5, by Weber, "Lovely Syrian land," was another popular piece, and will remain so, both as a contralto song and a quartet. The two duets No. 6 and 7 are the wild lays of the Carpathian shepherds—national Hungarian tunes—quaint, original, and expressive. Perhaps the most soul-stirring composition of the selection is the "Life and Song," by Storch, for two tenors and two basses. The singing clubs will soon render this spirited lay popular—it was the choral de bataille of the Hungarians. We may add, the pianoforte arrangement has been nicely done, and that there are admirable lithographed likenesses of the ten vocalists, drawn on stone by Mr. E. Grimstone.

COCKS' MUSICAL ALMANACK FOR 1850. Cocks and Co.

As the only Almanack in existence for musical purposes, the publication is of infinite value, and ought to be in the hands of every professor and amateur. The historic dates relative to the distinguished composers and singers, the list of musical societies, the anecdotes and biographies of musicians, are most useful for easy and quick reference. The work, however, is susceptible of great improvement: and the omission of some glaring puffery in a future year would be advisable.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

GREECE.

Lord STANLEY inquired whether the accounts that appeared in the newspapers relative to our hostile proceedings in Greece were correct.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE replied that the accounts in the newspapers were substantially correct. But no demand had been made by the British Government that was not strictly founded in justice. The Greek Government had been repeatedly required to make compensation, and had as repeatedly delayed doing so, and had at last refused to give any answer. The Government had no objection to produce all the papers, from which their Lordships would see that the Government had taken no step towards Greece that they were not morally and legally justified in taking.

The Earl of ABERDEEN expressed his dissatisfaction at this occurrence, especially with the demand for the restoration of the two islands.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE explained that the question about the islands of Sapienza and Cervi were not mixed up with the demands for compensation for the personal injuries suffered by British subjects and Ionians.

After a few observations from Lord BROUGHAM and Lord STANLEY, the subject —which was treated more at large in the Commons—dropped.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE laid on the table a Bill for the reconstitution of the Ecclesiastical Commission, which was read a first time.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE POOR-LAW AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

Mr. DISRAELI gave notice that, on the first order day, he should move that the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole House to take into consideration the propriety of making such a revision of the law for the relief of the poor as may mitigate the distress of the agricultural classes.

BORNEAN PIRATES.

To questions from Mr. Hume, Lord J. Russell replied that he had no objection to lay on the table all the information the Government had relative to the operations for the suppression of piracy against the natives of Borneo during the last year; as also the production of correspondence between the Governor of Malta and the Government respecting the Italian refugees; nor to the production of correspondence relative to the affairs of Cephalonia.

To a question from Mr. Ewart, Mr. GREENE stated that, though it would be possible to have the new chamber for the House of Commons ready by Easter, it would not be possible to have the necessary refreshment and other rooms—the indispensable adjuncts to the chamber—fully prepared before the beginning of the next session of Parliament.

OUR RELATIONS WITH GREECE AND OTHER FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

In answer to Mr. Gibson, Lord PALMERSTON related the course of events that had taken place at Athens. Mr. Wyse, our Minister at the Greek Court, had demanded compensation for injuries done to the British and Ionian subjects, whose claims were of long standing; the demand not having been satisfactorily answered, Mr. Wyse had gone on board Admiral Parker's ship: there the account stopped. He (Lord Palmerston) had no objection to lay on the table papers showing the whole transaction, should any hon. member ask for their production.

Mr. DISRAELI remarked that the noble Foreign Secretary's answer reminded him that the assurances given in the Speech from the Throne were premature. Those assurances, with respect to foreign relations, were, during the last two years, more meagre and unsatisfactory than usual. It was customary for the Sovereign to inform the Parliament that she had received from foreign powers assurances of friendly dispositions. But the language used this year only amounted to this—that we were not at war. He (Mr. Disraeli) wished to be informed if diplomatic relations had as yet been renewed with the Court of Madrid. He desired also to know if there was any prospect of having an Ambassador from Vienna sent to reside in London. With respect to the dispute between the Porte and the two Imperial Governments, the paragraph of the Speech appeared to be very obscurely worded: it appeared from their context that amicable arrangements had been completed first, and that then we intervened, when our interference was no longer required. He desired to know, likewise, if the Danish question had been yet settled. During two years the noble Foreign Secretary had held out the hope of this settlement, but it seemed as far off as ever.

Lord PALMERSTON replied that the grievances for which redress had been demanded from the Greek Government, were the wrongs done to Mr. Finlay and Mr. Pacifico, and one or two Ionian subjects. The islands of Sapienza and Cervi were by treaty recognised parts of the Ionian estate, and there could be no doubt about them. With respect to Spain, diplomatic relations were not renewed, nor had any arrangement been made up to the present moment for so doing. With respect to Austria, there was no Ambassador now at our Court; but, as an indication of our most friendly sentiments towards that empire, we continued our Ambassador at Vienna. Should the Austrian Government resolve to discontinue their Ambassador at the Court of St. James's, of course we should discontinue at Vienna an officer of higher rank than he should be accredited to us. With respect to Denmark, there was a great many interests and wills complicated in the question relative to it, and he could not pretend to say that much progress had been made towards a final settlement; but the wishes of parties seemed now seriously inclined towards a settlement, and therefore there was ground to hope for a successful termination of the dispute. As to the late misunderstanding between the Porte and the two Imperial Governments, the good offices of her Majesty's Government had accompanied the explanations which had proved so mutually satisfactory.

In answer to a question from Mr. Anstey, Lord PALMERSTON replied that he had reason to believe the Russian Government entertained none but friendly feelings towards the Turkish Government.

Sir R. INGLIS required to be informed if our officers in Greece had, in the late transactions, acted with the concurrence of the Governments of Russia and France.

Lord PALMERSTON replied that, in cases of seeking compensation for individual grievances, it was not usual to make application to other powers. Mr. Finlay and Mr. Pacifico were British subjects.

The matter here dropped.

RAILWAY AUDIT.

Mr. LOUGHNAN, in reply to a question, stated that he desired to see the question of Railway Audit taken up by railway companies themselves. In his opinion, a measure would come from them better than from the Government. He would, therefore, wait and see what the railway companies would propose.

THE REPORT ON THE ADDRESS.

On bringing up the report on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, a short discussion on the present condition of the agricultural interest ensued; at the close of which, the report of the Address was then received, which was ordered to be presented to her Majesty on Tuesday.

Adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Lord BROUGHAM remonstrated strongly with the Government on the severe treatment of Lieutenant Graham and Mr. Elliott since the late court-martial.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE promised to inquire the particulars from the First Lord of the Admiralty.

CLERGY PROCEEDINGS BILL.

The Bishop of LONDON re-introduced his Clergy Proceedings Bill, the same in its provisions as that of last year, with the addition of a clause providing for appeals in cases of heresy and false doctrine. The right rev. prelate said, he proposed by the new clause in this bill to establish a court of appeal, first to the Bishops, and then to the Archbishops, in cases of heresy and false doctrine, in lieu of that at present to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY approved of the plan of the court of appeal suggested by the right rev. prelate, and hoped the bill would pass into law.

Lord BROUGHAM likewise approved of the proposal.

The Lord CHANCELLOR proposed to give full attention to the subject.

The bill was read a first time.

Lord CAMPBELL laid on the table a Bill for amending the Marriage Law of Scotland.

After a few remarks from the Earl of ABERDEEN and Lord BROUGHAM, it was read a first time.

Lord MONTEAGLE moved for railway returns, and pressed on the attention of their Lordships the necessity of an independent and efficient audit of railway accounts. He suggested that in future no railway bill should be read a first time unless a full statement of its financial condition up to the most recent period should be previously laid on the table.

After a few words from Earl Granville, Earl Fitzwilliam, the Duke of Richmond, and Lord Brougham, the returns were ordered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. HORSMAN submitted to the House a resolution—"That a committee of this House, to which was entrusted an inquiry into the composition and management of the Ecclesiastical Commission, having recommended the appointment of three paid commissioners for the management of the property under the commission, it is expedient that effect be given to that recommendation." In support of his motion, the hon. member gave his history of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and censured in unmeasured terms the mismanagement of the affairs entrusted to them. He stated, amongst other accusations, that, although the commission was composed of the highest dignitaries of the Church, all the responsibility was cast upon the secretary, who had received, between the years 1835 and 1845, sums of money amounting to above a million sterling, all of which he had passed, without control or audit, to his own banker, and dealt with at his own pleasure. It was by an accident that attention was called to this extraordinary state of things. A motion having been made in Parliament for a return of the names of all persons who were shareholders in railway companies for amounts over £2000, the secretary of the Ecclesiastical Commission was returned as a subscriber to the extent of £580,000. This fact led to inquiry, and it was found that the commission was bankrupt, and that the secretary had run away with all the money he could secure. A committee was subsequently appointed, and, although its members were selected with the concurrence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, they came to the unanimous resolution that the management of the commission was indefensible; and they recommended the appointment of three paid commissioners to superintend the management of the property of the commission. In accordance with the recommendation of this committee, he asked the House to agree to his motion.

Sir C. GREY admitted that the composition of the Ecclesiastical Commission was defective, in so far as it consisted of a body too large, and in which the responsibility was too divided. There was, without doubt, a want of regular and systematic attention to business, and the management was left too much to the secretary: therefore, he concurred in the recommendation of the committee that the constitution of the commission required amendment. A bill has been introduced in the other House, which proposed the appointment of two paid commissioners, instead of three, as recommended by the committee. But the hon. gentleman asked the House to anticipate the discussion that would more properly be taken when the bill came regularly before them in committee. If his objection to the bill was that the paid commissioners were not three, he might propose an amendment in accordance with his opinion. But it was an unprecedented and unparliamentary course for the House to fetter its discretion with respect to a bill before the other House of Parliament; therefore he should resist the motion. The right hon. gentleman rebuked Mr. Horsman for his very strong language, and, in concluding his speech, referred to Mr. Horsman's letter to his constituents, in which he charged him (Sir C. Grey) with unworthy conduct in respect to this commission, and said that, as the honourable member did not attempt to repeat his charges in the House, he would not condescend to reply to them.

Mr. Aglionby, Sir H. Willoughby, Sir R. Inglis, and Mr. J. E. Denison made a few observations.

Mr. HORSMAN withdrew his motion, admitting that sufficient parliamentary ground had been given for not affirming it. He denied, however, that he shrunk from the charges made in his letter to his constituents against the Home Secretary, though he did not think proper to repeat them in the House.

Mr. H. DRUMMOND obtained leave to bring in a Bill to facilitate the transfer of Real Property, which was read a first time.

Mr. MOFFATT obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the LAW relating to BANKRUPT Members of the House of Commons, and to vacate the seats of Bankrupt and Insolvent Members of the House of Commons, and to facilitate the Recovery of Debts from such Members.

Mr. FAGAN obtained leave to bring in a Bill to make Life Policies of Insurance assignable at law, and to make other amendments in the law relating thereto.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Sir R. INGLIS moved for reports, statements, and plans relative to the Arctic expedition, and stated that his object was to induce the House to express sympathy with those brave men who were passing—it had been ascertained—their fifth winter in the Polar regions, and to urge the Government to make vigorous and immediate exertions for the rescue of our enterprising countrymen by the use of steam-vessels, by a division of numbers, and by the dispersion of small balloons. The cause of humanity, of national honour, and of science was involved in this last great effort.

Mr. ANSTEY seconded the motion.

Sir F. BARING said, that it was the intention of the Government to send out an expedition by the eastern route, and he would lay on the table a minute of the details. He assured the House that he was ready to consider with attention every practicable plan for the recovery of our brave countrymen. Money was no consideration, though it was a consideration how far Government would be justified in risking more lives. However, there was still sufficient hope to justify further attempts to ascertain the fate of Sir J. Franklin and his companions.

After a few words from Mr. WYLD, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. M. GIBSON moved for leave to bring in a Bill to establish County financial Boards for the assessing of county rates, and for the administration of county expenditure in England and Wales.

Mr. ANSTEY obtained leave to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Irish Fisheries Acts, which was read a first time.

Mr. MORRELL moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the act of last session for the collection of County Cess in Ireland. Agreed to, and read a first time.

Mr. FREWEN obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to the holding of Sinecures in Plurality, which was read a first time. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock.

THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

Mr. W. LASCELLES appeared at the bar with her Majesty's answer to the Address. It contained the usual expression of thanks, and assurances on the subject of her Majesty's sincere desire to promote the interests of her people, and to preserve unimpaired the institutions of the country.

The County Cess (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW IN IRELAND.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL moved for leave to bring in a bill for the regulation of process and practice in the superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland, also a bill to simplify and improve the proceedings in the Court of Chancery in Ireland; also a bill to amend the laws for the registration of assurances of lands in Ireland; also a bill to amend the laws concerning judgments in Ireland. The hon. and learned member shortly explained the scope and details of his bills. The object of the first was to assimilate the practice in Ireland, as far as possible, to that in England, and the second, to get rid of the gratuity and the unnecessary delay of Chancery proceedings; of the third, to provide a complete land index, based on the trigonometrical survey, and an index of titles, an index of wills, &c.; and of the fourth, to prevent judgments from being a charge on the whole lands, as at present, in Ireland, and to restrict them to particular lands, in the same way as mortgages.

A general declaration of approval of the scope of these bills having been given, and a like feeling having been expressed by Mr. Fagg Wood, Mr. Henley, Mr. Mullings, Mr. Walpole, and other hon. members for an extension to England of the Chancery reforms contemplated for Ireland, leave was given to bring in the bills.

THE MISGOVERNMENT OF THE ISLAND OF CEYLON.

Mr. HAWES moved the reappointment of the Select Committee to inquire into the grievances complained of in Ceylon, in connexion with the administration and government of that colony, and to report their opinion whether any measure can be adopted for the redress of any grievance of which there may be shown just reason to complain, and whether any measure can be adopted for the better administration and government of that dependency. The hon. Under-Secretary made his motion without any remark.

Mr. J. E. BAILLIE related the circumstances under which the committee of last year separated. They had come to a resolution that the chairman should communicate with the Secretary of State respecting the bringing over the witnesses necessary for examination on the charges made against the Governor of Ceylon. It was understood that that course was approved by the Colonial-office. But when application was made to Lord Grey, that noble Lord refused to bring over the witnesses, on the paltry ground of the expense; and he did this, by the management of the Colonial-office, the inquiry would be protracted beyond the present session. Had the required witnesses been produced, and had the inquiry been fairly carried out, (Mr. Baillie) hesitated not in declaring that acts of atrocity would have been proved against the Governor of Ceylon to which all that had been reported of Field-Marshal Haynau in Hungary would appear mild and merciful. Should the inquiry be pursued at all, he hoped the House would insist that it should be a fair and searching one, despite the unblushing attempts made by the Colonial-office to baffle and impede it. Referring to the case of British Guiana, the honourable member desired to know if the three recommendations of the committee on this colony had been carried out. If the salary of the Governor had been reduced, if a searching inquiry had been made into the appointments made by the late Governor, and if the constitution of British Guiana was altered in finally concert with the colonial authorities? If not, he (Mr. Baillie) heard was true, the changes made in the colony were effected by violence, and in contempt of the colonial authorities.

Mr. HAWES stated that the British Guiana committee had recommended the reduction of the Governor's salary; and asserted that reductions had been effected in the expenses of the colony to the extent of between £70,000 and £80,000 a year. The hon. Under-Secretary also asserted, that the recent changes in the constitution of the colony had been made with the concurrence and approval of the colonial authorities. With respect to Ceylon, Mr. Hawes declared, that a more hollow and rotten case, or a meaner conspiracy, was never attempted to be concocted. He charged Mr. Baillie with injustice and want of candour in making his statement, and emphatically denied that Earl Grey had refused to bring over the witnesses required by the committee. Had the witnesses named by Mr. Baillie arrived in November, been sent for, they could not have left Ceylon before the middle of February, and could not be here for some months. But there was abundant evidence on the spot for the committee to observe, other witnesses were coming, and as far as the committee might require them, others would be brought over. He (Mr. Hawes) pledged himself that the inquiry should go on to its legitimate conclusion, though he thought Mr. Baillie had better not go out of it and let it drop.

After a few words from Mr. HUME,

Mr. DISRAELI said the question for the House then to decide was a simple one, and should be confined to the understanding between the Government and the committee of last year relative to the production of witnesses. He thought the case was complete against the Government, and that they had evaded their agreement with the committee. Mr. Disraeli therefore moved, as an amendment to the motion, to the effect—"That in assenting to the reappointment of the committee," &c., "the House deems it expedient to express its disapprobation of the manner in which her Majesty's Government have evaded its understanding with the committee last year for the further production of witnesses."

Lord J. RUSSELL contended that the committee had gone beyond the regular powers of committees in delegating to its chairman the power to select witnesses during six months, and also beyond the understanding come to by him (Lord J. Russell) in that house. Even on the admission of the chairman of the committee himself, only two months had been lost, for it was no until the end of November that Mr. Baillie had written to Lord Grey for the four witnesses he then required. The noble Lord concluded his remarks by declaring that pre-judgment of the case, and calling on the House to weigh well the great interests involved in their decision.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM declared that he knew no man less capable of breaking an understanding, or of impeding an inquiry instituted by the House of Commons, than the noble Lord at the head of the Government. That was his general impression. But his special recollection of the understanding come to by the noble Lord was limited, and was to the effect, that the committee should meet on the earliest possible day; that they should agree upon the documents and evidence they would require, and what witnesses should be summoned; and that these should be notified to the Secretary of State. But this understanding was of secondary importance; the grave question placed before the House by Mr. Disraeli's amendment was, whether a vote of censure on the Government should be taken without notice, and in an incidental way.

After a few words of explanation from F. Maule, Mr. Bright said that Mr. Disraeli had shown his tact as a party leader in the amendment he had proposed. But he (Mr. Bright) could not vote for it. He would, however, vote for the addition to the original motion of the words "and that the four witnesses following (inserting their names) be forthwith summoned."

Mr. Disraeli had no wish to pass a vote of censure on the Government without notice, and would therefore withdraw. He was willing to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Manchester, and would therefore support it, quite satisfied with the expression of censure on the conduct of the Government conveyed in its terms.

Major Beackall, Mr. V. Smith, and Mr. Henley made a few observations.

Lord J. Russell refused to allow Mr. Disraeli's amendment to be withdrawn, as it was a motion of censure on him as head of the Government.

The House divided :—

For Mr. Disraeli's amendment	.. ..	68
Against it	.. ..	140
Majority against the amendment	..	—72

Mr. Bright then proposed his amendment.

Lord J. Russell said that if the first amendment was a censure on the Government, this was a censure on the committee.

The House again divided :—

For Mr. Bright's amendment	.. ..	100
Against it	.. ..	109
Majority against the amendment	..	—9

Six o'clock having arrived before the division was over, the committee was not nominated.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships met at five o'clock.

Petitions, complaining of agricultural distress, were presented by the Earl of Bandon and the Earl of Feversham.

The Earl of Feversham also presented a petition from York, praying for the closing of every post-office on Sunday.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

Lord Brougham gave notice, that he should the next day call the attention of their Lordships to the circumstance that, in the year 1840, when the bill was passed appointing the Ecclesiastical Commission, on the last day before the bill passed, the last clause was introduced, by which a certain person was appointed secretary and treasurer of the commission for life.

Their Lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at a few minutes before four o'clock.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. Hatchell, the new member for Windsor, in the room of Lord John Hay, took the oaths and his seat.

NEW WRIT.

On the motion of Mr. Tufnell, a new writ was ordered for Kirkcudbright, in the room of Mr. Maitland, late Solicitor-General for Scotland, appointed one of the Lords of the Court of Session in Scotland, in the room of Lord Jeffrey.

Several petitions were presented by hon. members on private and public subjects.

REFORM OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. Hume gave notice that he would, on an early day, move for leave to bring in a bill for an extension and equalisation of the suffrage, and for vote by ballot, and shortening the duration of Parliament.

THE IRISH COURTS.

The Solicitor-General brought in the four bills, for the introduction of which he obtained leave yesterday.

THE MALT-TAX.

Mr. Cayley gave notice that he would, on the earliest possible day, bring forward his motion with respect to the repeal of the Malt-Tax.

THE WOODS AND FORESTS.

Mr. Hayter gave notice that, as soon as the Chancellor of the Exchequer was able to attend the House, he would introduce the Bill for the improved management of the Woods and Forests.

THE IRISH COUNTY COURTS.

In answer to a question from Mr. Fagan, Sir Wm. Somerville said, that although he could not give any assurance that any measure would be introduced for assimilating County Courts in Ireland to those in England, a measure on the subject was under the consideration of the Government.

THE MINT.

In answer to a question from Mr. Hume, Lord J. Russell said that a measure was in preparation, and would be shortly introduced, with respect to the management of the Mint.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. Roebuck called the attention of the House to a letter which had been addressed by the hon. gentleman the member for Cockermouth (Mr. Horsman) to his constituents, accusing the noble Lord at the head of the Government with having committed a fraud on the House with reference to the bill which he had introduced last Session for the regulation of the Ecclesiastical Commission.

Lord John Russell indignantly denied that he had been guilty of any fraud or unfair dealing. When it was found necessary to amend the bill with respect to the Ecclesiastical Commission, he was compelled to print the bill with the amendments to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and those amendments were at the same time printed and circulated, to among others the hon. gentleman the member for Cockermouth. After having done so, and acted in the most open manner in the whole business, he thought it was great presumption in the hon. gentleman the member for Cockermouth to accuse him (Lord John Russell) of having committed a fraud upon Parliament.

Sir George Grey said that he had read the letter of the hon. gentleman the member for Cockermouth, but from its tone and language he thought it beneath his notice. There was not the slightest ground for making the charge of fraud which was contained in it; and it appeared to him a wretched exhibition of bad temper, unworthy of notice; and he gave to the charge contained in it the most unqualified denial.

Mr. Horsman said that he would in the face of Parliament reiterate his charge, and, if an opportunity were allowed to him, he would be prepared to prove it.

Lord J. Russell said that when such a charge had been made against the Government, the hon. gentleman should have been prepared to come down and move for a Select Committee to investigate his charge, and he (Lord J. Russell) would certainly not oppose the appointment of such a committee.

The subject then dropped.

LOCAL TAXATION OF DWELLING-HOUSES.

Mr. P. Scrope moved for leave to bring in a bill to exempt dwelling-houses below a certain value from local taxation. From the letters which had appeared in the Times, signed "S. G. O.," from reports presented by various commissions, and from the letters which had recently appeared in the Morning Chronicle, it was made manifest to the world that the state of the humbler classes of householders in this country imperiously demanded the consideration of Parliament, with the view of improving their social and physical comforts. It was creditable to the landlords of the country to build commodious dwellings for the poor upon their estates, but he feared that in erecting them the landlords looked more to the ornamenting of their properties than to the comfort and the means of the persons who were to inhabit them. Even the sites of the houses so built for the labouring classes were selected, not with regard to the accommodation of the persons who were to occupy them, but for the purpose of giving an increased value to the property. The population was increasing at the rate of 1000 a day, and that increase of population required enlarged house-room; but instead of meeting the necessity in that way, they were decreasing the means of house-room acc mmodation. The question to which he wished to call the attention of the House was, whether, with the increased necessity for greater house-room, the House was willing to pass a measure to give facilities for greater accommodation -or whether, as at present, they were to limit the amount of house-room in an inverse ratio to increased population ? (Hear.) The only way in which they could give additional facilities and encouragement to increased house-accommodation for the poor was by exempting them from local and public burdens; and if, as was the case, palaces and large mansions were exempted from local taxation, he saw no reason why the dwellings of the poor should not also be exempted. All the woods and all the mines (except coal mines) of the country were exempted from taxation; and if exemptions were made to those important and wealthy interests, exemptions should be made also in favour of the classes who were not able to bear local taxation. His proposition was, that in towns where the population was under 10,000, the occupations of persons occupying houses at a rental of £5 per annum should be exempted; in country districts he wished to see exempted all houses under £7 or £8 a year; and in towns in which the population amounted to near 50,000, he was of opinion that houses of £10 rent should be relieved from local taxation.

Mr. A. Stafford said he proposed to test the opinion of the House on the principles and provisions of the bill on the first reading; as from the nature of the bill, he thought that would be the more constitutional course. He believed the object of the bill would be to increase the rent of small tenements, and not to diminish them, and to place in the pockets of the landlord and not of the tenants the reduced taxation.

Sir George Grey said it was most satisfactory to observe that both in the metropolis and in the provinces great exertions had recently been made to improve the dwellings of the poor, and he feared that the bill of his hon. friend would interfere with the progress of that exertion and its results. He was perfectly satisfied that if the bill were passed, the owners, and not the occupiers of small tenements, would derive all the benefits which it was intended to confer.

Mr. Slaney was of opinion that if the bill passed, it would have the effect of preventing the building of a better class of small tenements than was erected at present. He would, therefore, vote against the bill

Mr. P. Scrope, in reply, said that he had not anticipated any opposition to the bill on the motion which he had made, as he had laboured under the impression that the discussion would have taken place on the second reading, but as a disposition had been evinced by the House not to allow the bill to progress to a second reading, he felt bound to state that he had been most severely dealt with.

Mr. Vernon Smith was of opinion that the bill would not confer any benefit on the classes to whom the hon. gentleman the member for Stroud (Mr. P. Scrope) had alluded, and he thought the best thing his hon. friend could do was to withdraw the bill.

Mr. P Scrope ultimately withdrew his motion.

THE LATE WAR IN HUNGARY.

Lord Dudley Stuart rose to move "an address for copies or extracts of any correspondence between the British Government and the Embassies at Constantinople, St. Petersburg, and Vienna, respecting the demands of Russia and Austria for the extradition of Polish, Hungarian, and Italian refugees : of any correspondence between the Government of this country and the Governments of Turkey, Russia, and Austria, on the same subject : of any correspondence between the Government of Great Britain and the Embassies at Vienna and St. Petersburg, respecting the late Hungarian war : of any correspondence between the Government of this country and the Governments of Austria and Russia, on the same subject : copies of any proposal addressed by the late national Government of Hungary to the Governments of Great Britain, respecting the admission of British manufactures and produce into Hungary : also, copies or extracts of any correspondence between the Government of this country and the ambassadors at Constantinople and St. Petersburg, and the consuls at Bucharest and Galaty, respecting the occupation of the principalities of the Danube by Russian troops : of any correspondence between the Government of this country and the Governments of Turkey and Russia, on the same subject : and copy of the circular of Count Nesselrode, dated the 19th to the 31st day of July, 1848, addressed to the representatives of the Russian Government at the different Courts of Europe." His Lordship declared in that address that Austria had violated the Hungarian Constitution, and had, by the alterations which she had introduced, changed the tenure and right of property in Hungary to a great extent. The House of Commons, and the other constituent authorities of Hungary, came to certain resolutions, but Colonel Jellachich, the Viceroy of Austria, opposed the carrying out of those alterations, and by violence convoked the General Assembly of Croatia, in order to annul, or, at any rate to oppose, the action of the Hungarian Diet. An energetic protest was published against his principles and actions ; and in a work which was in the course of passing through the press by a Hungarian lady, and an early copy of which had been handed to him, a full account was given of the conduct of the Austrian Government, in order to effect the atrocious objects of that Government against Hungarian freedom. The noble Lord read several extracts from the work in question, detailing the atrocities committed, and the details of which have frequently appeared in our paper at the time. When the Hungarian Constitution had been violated, when the patriots of Hungary were driven to extremities, when reluctant to destroy the Constitution of their country, and when the Austrian Government had, by means of armed force, attempted to destroy the liberties of Hungary, they came to the resolution that the line of Hapsburgh should cease to exist on the throne of Hungary. The Hungarians had only followed the example of England, when it changed the reigning family because that family had swerved from the principles of the Constitution, and had endeavoured to substitute despotic and arbitrary Government for a Constitutional one. After the contest between the people of Hungary and the Austrian Government had been decided upon the battle-field, and mainly decided by means of Russian interference, the refugee Hungarian army took refuge in Turkey and Russia, the latter power having improperly, and against the law of nations, been called in to aid Austria. Russia, again, in violation of the law of nations, stated that such of the refugees as were Polish should be delivered up to the tender mercies of the Autocrat of all the Russias. Russia had done this willingly, no doubt; but she had the pretext of doing so at the instigation of the Austrian Government ; and such was the indignation felt amongst the Hungarians against the treacherous and servile actions of the Austrian Government in that respect, that they would rather serve with the Russian than the Austrian forces. The Russian forces had been called into Hungary by the Austrian Government, and those forces were not maintained at the expense of the Austrian Government, but at the expense of the unfortunate inhabitants of Hungary ; and he should like to know how the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs could justify a payment of such sums not to mention an army, quartered upon him and placed in his house, and have to pay the weekly bill for their maintenance? (Hear, hear.) That infamous proceeding had called forth the indignation of Europe, and not of Europe only, but that of America, the principal member of the Government of that country having unequivocally expressed himself in favour of the Hungarian struggle. Again it was a violation of the law of nations, and of subsisting treaties with Turkey, to keep the Russian troops in the Danubian territories after the contest was over. It was the conduct of a country not from mere principles of justice alone to oppose Russia, but also from interested motives; for there was no doubt, and every statesman knew the fact, that Russia desired to advance her power into our Eastern Empire ; and it was therefore the duty of the English Government to frustrate her attempts to injure other states, as a preparatory effort, the more readily and easily to get at her objects on British India. For the present, the Russians had abandoned their attempts on the Turkish territory, because a British fleet had made its appearance in the Dardanelles ; but he could assure the House that the attempt would be again repeated. He concluded by moving the motion of which he had given notice.

Lord Palmerston's Government was anxious to give every information upon the subject to which the noble Lord had alluded that it could do : but as the motion stood, it embraced so extensive a field that, if agreed to, it would be necessary for the Government to produce papers from all corresponding with it would be exceedingly undesirable to publish ; and he, therefore, hoped the Government would be allowed to make such selections as would not be prejudicial to the public service. The Government was anxious to give every information on the subject of foreign countries. Last session he had fully stated his opinions with respect to the Hungarian question, and he believed that opinion had been reciprocated by the all but unanimous voice of the country. He was confident that the House did great credit to the feeling of this country. He was enabled to say that the Russian Government would very speedily reduce its force in Moldavia and Wallachia to 10000 men, and he was sure that would be satisfactory to the House. The noble Lord then referred to the manner in which had treated Turkey in appeal to England, and said it was but right to state, in justice to the Russian Government, that when that appeal had been made, Russia consented no longer to insist upon certain concessions that she had once required, and the manner by which Turkey became bound to remove the Polish refugees from the Turkish soil. The diplomatic relations between Russia and Turkey had been re-established; and although the Circassian affair would continue to be a subject of dispute, it had not been actually established, there was every prospe t of their being so very speedily. Throughout these difficult and intricate transactions, Sir Stratford Canning had acted with consummate judgment and ability, and it was in a great measure to him that credit was due for the re-establishment of a settlement of the misunderstandings which had arisen. Under these circumstances, he hoped the noble Lord would not press his motion, but would be satisfied with such extracts as he (Lord Palmerston) would feel authority to give.

Mr. C. Anstey said that the opinion which he had expressed in the House last session on this most important and interesting subject, he saw no reason, from what had subsequently occurred, to change ; and, notwithstanding the statement of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, he could not see why the papers asked for should not be given. Russia had, throughout the transactions to which allusion had been made, violated her pledged faith, and the assurance of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary that Russia would reduce her forces was anything but satisfactory. They had no assurance from that Power of Russia or the Government that it would withdraw would take place ; and, under these circumstances, he hoped the House would insist on the production of the papers called for by his noble friend the member for the borough of Marylebone.

Lord Dudley Stuart said that he would be satisfied with such papers as the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary could lay on the table of the House ; but, at the same time, he trusted the noble Lord would lay on the table papers relating to every attempt which had been made by Austria or Russia to attempt the life of Kossuth ; and he hoped that the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign-Office would use his influence to prevent such attempts.

Lord Cockburn deplored the condition of the poor Lord in asking that an attempt had been made to poison some of the Hungarian refugees. If the noble Lord felt fully that such an attempt had been made, it was the duty of the noble Lord to bring forward the proof, and not to allow the matter to rest on the subject, and not make sweeping assertions, which had no foundation except in the imagination or malevolence of those who instructed the noble Lord.

Mr. Cockburn said, that the motion appeared to him to be founded upon that the Government had not done its duty, and he regretted, after the admirable speech of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary last session, that any such doubt should have been thrown out. He believed that the struggle between Hungary and Austria was founded on the rights of the people of Hungary for their ancient Constitution ; and he could not but regret that, in the English House of Commons, an English gentleman should stand up to defend the proceedings of Austria in Hungary ; and that, in the face of the resolutions of this country which had been done in Austria had been done in England under similar circumstances ; and he might also refer to wholesale murders which were daily taking place in Ceylon and other dependencees of England. When their own conduct was in this doubtful, and exacting language of the noble Lord, he could not but wish caution of the conduct of other Governments. Nothing gratified him more than to hear so great a care evinced for the integrity of the Turkish Empire ; he only remembered a time when he had the honour to hear and advocated the integrity of that empire, he found himself in a minority, and that by the acts and policy of a Liberal Government. The Liberal Government had entered into a treaty for the sustaining of the Turkish Empire, and had at Navarino they had made their first attack in that cru ade. He was glad, however to find that the Foreign Secretary and his friends had taken Canning for their example ; he hoped the Government would pursue its system of recantations of their former policy, even if that was done in scanty Houses. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary would, if left alone, do tolerably well ; but he was pressed forward by the Liberal party to interfere in matters with which he had nothing to do, and that party in utter ignorance of the matters on which they spoke and dictated to Parliament.

Sir De Lacy Evans censured the conduct of the Austrian Government in its conduct towards Hungary, and defended the conduct of the Hungarians, and of the English Government in respect to the late war in Hungary.

After a few words from Sir R. Inglis,

Mr. Monkton Milnes said he was gratified to find that the debate had called out so general a sympathy with the Hungarians.

Mr. Henry Grattan hoped it would not be considered that the noble Lord (Lord Claude Hamilton) had expressed the sentiments of the people of Ireland with regard to the Hungarians, for the great majority of the people of Ireland sympathised with the noble Hungarians.

The motion was then withdrawn.

THE DISFRANCHISEMENT OF THE BOROUGH OF SUDBURY.

Major Beckett presented a petition from Sudbury, praying that they might be represented in Parliament.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF KENSINGTON, &c.

Mr Macgregor moved, "that in consideration of the parishes of Kensington, Chelsea, Fulham, and Hammersmith, containing a population of about 120 inhabitants, residing on an area not exceeding 6700 acres, and comprising also above 13,000 houses, of the annual rental of £10 and upwards ; and further, in consideration that there is no other district in Great Britain with so great a number of inhabitants and houses unrepresented directly in this House, it is expedient and just to incorporate, by an Act of Parliament, the parishes of Kensington, Chelsea, Fulham, and Hammersmith, into a parliamentary borough, empowered to return two members to this House, to fill up the vacancies caused by the disfranchisement of the said borough of Sudbury."

Mr. Hume seconded the motion.

Mr. Bagshaw said, that a new race having got up in Sudbury since it had been disfranchised, he hoped the House would not agree to the motion, but would give to to the people of Sudbury the right of returning members to Parliament.

Mr. Campbell opposed the motion

Sir George Grey said, there might be conflicting claims in other parts of the country, and until that subject was fully considered he would oppose the motion. At the time of the Reform bill the state of the representation had been very fully considered, and he thought the enactment of the representation then made should not be lightly disturbed. The House had not at present sufficient information to legislate upon the subject, and he therefore hoped the House would not consent to the motion.

Mr. Hume said the number of members of the House of Commons was not at present complete ; and, as the parishes mentioned in the motion were large and populous ones, he thought it ought to be constituted into a parliamentary borough, and be entitled to return two members to Parliament. He admitted that other places had claims, but the House would soon be forced to decide the question. He was disappointed that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had not stated his views on the subject of an extension of the franchise, which they expected to have heard earlier, from what had appeared in the demi official organ of the Government.

After a few words from Col. Dunne, Mr. M'Gregar withdrew his motion.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER

Mr. Stuart Wortley moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend and alter an act passed in the 5th and 6th years of the reign of William the Fourth, so far as to remove certain impediments to marriages within certain prohibited degrees of affinity. The hon. and learned gentleman said, that in the bill which he wished to introduce, he did not wish to interfere with the laws of the Church, and there was no compulsory provision in it making it imperative upon members of the Church to solemnize marriages with a deceased wife's sister.

Sir R. Inglis said, that the measure was alike against the law of the land and the law of the Church, and against the feelings of the people ; and he therefore felt it necessary to persevere in the opposition which he had on former sessions given to his little different from the present bill. With respect to a large body of the people of England, there was but one, and that a hostile, opinion with regard to the bill ; and with regard to the people of Scotland and Ireland, they were unanimously opposed to any alteration of the existing law.

Mr. Sidney Herbert said, that, speaking for himself, as a member of the Church of England, he was opposed to the bill, but, looking at the interests and the different opinions of the Roman Catholics and the Dissenters, he felt constrained to give his support to the introduction of the measure ; and he felt also that to oppose marriages with a deceased wife's sister, as made by the Dissenters if it was refused to lay the bill on the table of the House.

Mr. Law thought the bill a violation of the law, and one which should not be allowed to be introduced. If the bill, which was a violation of the law, were allowed to pass, there would be enactments framed to violate the law in every respect.

Mr. Mangles was in favour of the introduction of the bill.

Mr. Goulburn was unfavourable to the measure. He had opposed the previous bill, and the present bill would be condemned (Mr. Stuart Wortley) on the same subject ; and he saw nothing in the present bill which would induce him to view the present bill more favourably than its predecessors.

The question was then ordered to withdraw, and the House divided, when there appeared—

Leave was then given to introduce the bill.

Mr. Scholefield moved for leave to introduce a Bill for the further Extension of Summary Jurisdiction in cases of Larceny.

Mr. Parker moved for leave to bring in a Bill to Repeal an Act of the 6 o Geo. IV., for encouraging the capture or destruction of piratical ships and vessels.

After a few words from Mr. Goulburn, the motion was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. P. Wood, returns connected with the Court of Chancery were ordered to print.

Mr. Bright withdrew his motion with respect to memorials and addresses presented with respect to Margaret Hamilton, executed at Glasgow on the 31st of January.

PENAL ACTS AGAINST THE ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIGION.

Mr. C. Anstey moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the penal acts against the Roman Catholic religion.

Sir R. Inglis wished to know from the Secretary for the Home Department whether the Government would oppose or support the bill.

Mr Law also wished to know if it was the intention of the Government to support the bill ; because, if they did not, it would be better to save the time of the House by refusing to allow it to be introduced.

Sir George Grey said it was not his intention to support the bill as a whole, but he was not opposed to the repeal of certain penal statutes affecting the Roman Catholics. He believed there was very little prospect of the bill passing, and he would advise the hon. and learned gentleman to withdraw it.

Strangers were ordered to withdraw, and the House divided, when there appeared :—

The bill, consequently, was not introduced.

The other orders of the day were then disposed of; and the House adjourned at one o'clock.

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Their Lordships met at five o'clock.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, the Registrars Office Bankruptcy Bill was read a third time and passed.

Viscount COMBERMERE presented two petitions from the county of Chester, developing of agricultural distress, and praying for Protection.

The Earl of WINCHELSEA presented a similar petition, agreed to at a county meeting held at Lincoln.

Lord STANLEY gave notice that, on Monday, the 18th instant, he should call the attention of their Lordships to the unfortunate circumstance connected with the affair at Dolly's Brae on the 12th July last, and the circumstances relating to the dismissal of the Earl of Roden and two other magistrates. He gave this early notice, in order that the Lord-Lieutenant might have such timely notice as to enable him to be present.

The Earl of RODEN trusted the Lord Lieutenant would be in his place on the occasion.

Lord BROUGHAM said he found the clause to which he had called their Lordships' attention on Thursday, relative to the appointment of the Secretary to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, had not been surreptitiously introduced but publicly; and he should, therefore, withdraw the notice which he had given for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the subject.

Lord BROUGHAM laid on the table a Bill to amend the Law of Distress in Scotland.

On the motion of the noble and learned Lord, the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Bill was read a second time.

The Bishop of EXETER presented a petition from the Archdeacon and clergy of East Cornwall, against the performance of Post-office duties on Sundays.

Their Lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly before four o'clock.

Mr. HEALD presented petitions from Lancashire, praying for the cessation of labour in the Post-office on the Sabbath.

Several similar petitions were presented from various places throughout the Kingdom.

Mr. W. BROWN presented a petition from a place in Lancashire, praying for the establishment of local boards to govern the county expenditure.

Mr. ALDERMAN SIDNEY presented from Cork, praying for a grant from Parliament for national education in Ireland.

Sir W. MOLESWORTH presented a petition from New Zealand, complaining of various grievances. He had a petition from New South Wales, complaining of various breaches of faith with them on the part of the Colonial Office, and praying that it might not again be made a penal settlement.

Lord J. RUSSELL moved that the House should at its rising adjourn to Monday next.—Agreed to.

Mr. C LISTOWEL said, since he had given notice of his intention to put a question to the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) relative to the city of London election, he had been informed that there was a petition pending against the return of Baron Rothschild, and, as under these circumstances his question would be premature, unproductive, irregular, and disrespectfull to the House, he should withdraw it.

In reply to a question from Mr. J. Williams, Lord DUNCAN said he would on an early day renew his motion for the repeal of the Window-tax.

In reply to a question from Mr. H. Berkeley, Sir G. GREY said, it was the intention to introduce a measure, if possible, in the present session, upon the subject of intramural interments

Mr. HORSMAN gave notice of a motion for Monday next, for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the charges which he had made against Lord John Russell and Sir G. Grey

OUR COLONIAL POLICY.—THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL said, he believed few hon. members were not impressed with the necessity of some general statement being made with regard to the colonies, and to be pursued by the Government. So many statements had been put forward, and so many acts ascribed to them, that he thought it the imperative duty of the Government to state what was to be their future policy with regard to the colonies of the British Crown. He confessed that he felt himself almost appalled by the magnitude of the task; but he was consoled by the reflection that there were in that House many hon. members who had devoted their attention to the colonial policy of the country for years past, and who would be able to throw more additional light upon the subject. He thought it of importance that they should know the extent and importance of their colonies generally, that the House might know what it was sought to govern, and what it was they were anxiously to maintain in connexion with the mother country. Setting aside the American colonies, which had shaken off all connexion with the mother country, he would first refer to the original settlements in the West Indian Islands. He reminded the House of the expedition fitted out by Cromwell, which accomplished the reduction of the Island of Jamaica. In the reign of George II. other islands were added and that was the commencement of their West Indian colonies. In the beginning of the next century, Gibraltar was taken possession of; and after the glorious war of 1756, additional islands were obtained, besides the important cession of Canada, including those known by the name of the Canadas. In the two great periods in which they had been obtained, he found that between 1600 and 1700 they had obtained Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward's Island, Bermuda, Providing Island, Nevis, the Virgin Islands and the entire establishment of Gambia on the African coast. From 1700 to 1792 they had obtained Gibraltar, Canada, Sierra Leone, the first settlement of New South Wales, St. Vincent, Tobago, and some other West India islands. Between 1799 and 1815 they obtained St. Lucia, British Guiana, Demerara, Berbice, and Essequibo, Malta, the Cape of Good Hope, the Mauritius, Van Diemen's Land, &c. Most of these colonies were peopled by emigrants, either sent out by the Government at home or by private enterprise. It was found that the best and most free system of Government; but up to 1793, the policy that generally prevailed was that of governing those colonies by proclamations, and in a manner not altogether upon the model of the British constitution. Commercial regulations were afterwards granted by Mr. Huskisson to the West Indian colonies, to enable them to establish a more intimate intercourse with the United States; and the repeal of the Navigation Laws in the last year had, in his opinion, put an end for ever to the system of commercial monopoly which had so long prevailed. He did not propose at the present time to discuss the wisdom or the expediency of that policy; but it might have given rise to a question which, although modified by various writers, might be broadly stated as this—whether it would be advisable to retain the se colonies in connexion with the British Crown. Before he came to that question, however, he would refer to the large increase that had taken place in the population of the various colonies. From 1801 to 1841 British North America had increased in the following ratio—from 462,000, in 1816, to 1,093,000 in 1838; and thence to 1,856,000 in 1847. In Upper and Lower Canada the increase from 1820 to 1840 was 65 per cent; from 1831 to 1843, it was 55 per cent. , from 1843 to 1848, it was 28 per cent. In New South Wales—which, some years after it was founded, had only a population of 2000 (half of whom were convicts)—the population of not less than 200,000 was found, (half of whom only 6000 were convicts. The exports of the Australian colonies generally had also increased in a very considerable ratio, and were, at the present time, very prosperous. He now referred to the state of slavery, which was a peculiar circumstance (he meant the West India Islands), which had undergone a great social change in the abolition of slavery, and which had necessarily established a considerable amount of inconvenience and loss upon them. He found that on the average of three years under the old system of slavery, up to 1815, the quantity of sugar manufactured for home consumption was 2,947,524 cwt.; that for the three years before emancipation was 3,850,820; that the average, before the changes in the sugar duties was 2,645,212 cwt.; and the average of three years since that period was 2,807,656 cwt. They had, therefore, borne the severe period of trial through which they had passed better than the Government, under all the circumstances, had a right to have come to the question that had been recently mooted, namely, whether they were come to that period when their best policy would be to give up these colonies. He, for one, trusted and that it was the bounden duty of the country to maintain the colonies that had been placed under their charge; they could not abandon them, nor get rid of their responsibility. (Loud cheers) He might refer to the Canadas, in which the extension of their colonial system of policy had produced in New Zealand, where a population existed which was formerly addicted to the most horrible and unobvilised practices. There was also Port Natal, in which they found a race extremely susceptible of improvement and cavilisation. It was urged that, like the United States, these co.onies, if left to themselves, would become free and independent, and great; but he would ask the House to mind how many of these colonies were so small and so weak, that they would be utterly unable, if left to themselves, to maintain their integrity and independence, and that they would fall an easy prey to their neighbours, by whom they were surrounded. It was, therefore, in his opinion, impracticable, as it would be most impolitic, to remove that course. Another suggestion was that these colonies should be left to themselves, and that the mother country should exercise no interference with their local government. Why, they had an example in the course of last session of the difficulty of drawing a line between the laws which should emanate from the House and those which should originate with the colonial authorities; and he should, therefore, think it would be extremely difficult to draw any precise line that would satisfy both parties. The noble Lord then referred to the difficulties that existed in the case of the West India colonies, with regard to the Protection to be afforded to the emancipated Negroes, and the regulations for the future government of the colony, after they had been made free, all of which, he was happy to say, no longer existed. The great essential point, in his opinion, was that the House should know and understand upon what principles this great and valuable Colonial Empire should be maintained? (Hear, hear.) They ought to see that these principles were sound in legislation; that they were a credit to the country, and a source of happiness to the colonies. (Cheers.) He was glad in the first place that the system of commercial monopoly was for ever at an end. But, with regard to their future government, it appeared to him that they could not, as a general rule, do better than proceed upon the maxim of their ancestors, namely, that wherever the English people went, they should carry with them English freedom and English constitutional systems and institutions. (Hear, hear.) The noble Lord then referred to the declaration that had lately emanated from a number of members of that and the other House of Parliament (the Colonial Reform Association), with regard to the mode in which the colonies should be in future governed. It appeared to him that their correspondence with those colonies was a question of very dubious policy. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") Commencing with the North American colonies and Canada, he would observe, that up to 1838 grave discussions had taken place in that colony, and these dissensions had ultimately broken out in a rebellion, which the energy and loyalty of the people had ultimately put down. The House was aware of the unhappy discussions that had taken place in that colony, and they had appeared to the gentlemen composing this association so serious in their nature, that it was suggested they should abandon the Canadas, and annex them to the United States of America. To that proposition, should it be made, her Majesty's Government could give nothing but a most decided negative. (Loud cheers.) He trusted, therefore, that such a proposition would not emanate from that association, seeing that it was the determination of this country, should any appeal be made, not to permit of its being carried into effect, so far as was in their power. Since the recent alteration in the constitution of Canada, he believed the appeals to the Secretary for the Colonies had been much less frequent, and that, upon the whole, the new constitution had been found to work extremely well. He now came to the Cape of Good Hope, from which colony applications had been frequently made; but, up to the time when the noble friend, Lord Stanley, left the Colonial Office, the obstacles were such that they could not be satisfactorily arranged. Recent circumstances, and more mature deliberation, had reduced her Majesty's Government to come to the conclusion that representative institutions should be introduced into the Cape of Good Hope. (Cheers.) Instead of imitating the constitutions of Jamaica and Canada, they proposed that a council should be established elective in its character, but that the election should be by persons having a much higher qualification than those who were to choose the representatives. They proposed, also, that the representatives should be elected for a period of five years, that the electoral council for a period of ten years, but that half the members of the council to retire every five years, somewhat after the model of the Belgian constitution. (Loud cheers.) With regard to the Australian [colonies, the Government proposed to form a council select—two-thirds of them nominatives of the people, and one-third to be nominated by the Government. At the same time they thought it would be advisable that the colonies should have the power of altering the form of the constitution to suit the wants and wishes of the people. He proposed that Port Philip should be separated from New South Wales, and have its own legislative council; that the popular element should also be introduced into the constitution of Van Diemen's Land, which had at present a legislative council, and that it should be upon the same model as the others. In South Australia, also, a similar body should be organised. Then with regard to the price of land, the Government thought it would be advisable that it should be sold at a uniform price of twenty shillings throughout all the colonies of Australia; and to prevent one colony bidding against the other for emigrants, that no alteration should take place in the price of land in the colonies it took place in all. He trusted that the proposition they were now submitting to the House with regard to the Cape of Good Hope and the Australian colonies would be such as to give full scope to the will of the people, and enable them to work their way to their own prosperity, without being trammelled or interfered with by any laws or regulations emanating from the mother country. (Cheers.) With regard to British Guiana and the Mauritius, it was proposed to add to the free institutions they already enjoyed, to give them the benefit of municipal councils at the seat of government, which would tend, naturally, according to the communications he had had from their respective Governors, to promote their internal prosperity. He now came to a question of the greatest importance as connected with the future welfare of these colonies; he meant the system of transportation to the Australian colonies and the Cape of Good Hope. It had ever been the anxious wish of the Government to put a last system to an end least possible injury to the interests of these colonies. The noble Lord then referred to the resistance of the inhabitants of the Cape of Good Hope to the landing of 300 convicts sent there from Ireland; it was merely a temporary expedient, arising out of the peculiar circumstances of Ireland at the time; and it appeared to him that the fears of the colonists had been, in that instance, greatly exaggerated; they had, however, been sent on to Van Diemen's Land, but he thought the House would soon have seriously to consider whether it would not be advisable to make some large and extensive alteration in the present system of transportation, and its application to classes of offences which were not of the very greatest character. (Hear, hear.) He now came to the equally interesting and important question of emigration, and its applicability to the circumstances of their colonies. After reviewing the different modes in which the system of emigration was carried on, he observed, that the emigration from that country had for the last three years been carried out at the rate of 265,000 per annum, being the entire amount of the estimated increase of the population in this country. He believed they could annually send a similar number emigrating for several years to come. He did not think any Government system could have answered the purpose of emigration so well, or could have been carried to so great an extent. If the Government had the means of a million or two to that purpose, it would have led to the greatest possible abuses. (Hear, hear.) Under these circumstances, he should deprecate any large interference on the part of the Government. Another system of emigration was in operation with regard to the Australian colonies. He found the Commissioners had sent out in the years 1848 and 1849 no less than 37,000 emigrants. He had now gone through the whole of the propositions which the Government had to lay before the House. It appeared to him that they ought to treat with the colonies on the principle of purchasing the productions which the colonies could not produce so cheap, wherever they could be obtained on the best terms, and that they should concede to the colonies all the internal messages. (Cheers.) They should also proceed upon the wise maxim of their ancestors, and introduce, wherever it was practicable, political freedom and liberal institutions. (Loud cheers.) These were the sound principles upon which they ought to proceed—and were the principles on which the Government intended to proceed—and which, they trusted, would obtain the sanction and approbation of that House. The question was not now whether they would keep up the colonies, or leave them to take care of themselves, for, although the forces at present stationed in those colonies might be reduced, they were bound to give them at all times the means of defence. He did not mean to say that the day might not arrive when some of these colonies might be enabled to contribute to the support of this country; but whether that period would ever arrive or not, th ir duty was to place them in such a position as they would be enabled to govern themselves and to work out most effectually their own prosperity and happiness. The noble Lord sat down amidst loud and general cheering.

Sir WILLIAM MOLESWORTH complained of the series of blunders and mismanagement that had prevailed for so many years with regard to the colonies, and which fully justified the charges that had been brought against the Colonial Office, and the many serious disturbances that had taken place in some of these colonies. With regard to the plan now submitted to the House by the noble Lord, he confessed that there were some parts of it he could not very well understand. It would appear that something like the existing Belgian constitution was to be imported into this country, and thence sent out to the Cape of Good Hope, with a power to adopt or reject it, as they thought proper. He reminded the House of the ignorance displayed by the Colonial Secretary on former occasions with regard to the constitutions enjoyed by the Australian Colonies. The noble Lord was now about to found upon them a representative government, which he alledged was framed upon the model of the free British Constitution; but where one-third of the representatives were to be officials, and immediately connected with the Government, the House would see the absurdity of such a system of freedom (Hear, hear.) He regretted to find that it was the intention of the noble Lord and his Government to adhere still to the objectionable course of policy which had produced all their previous embarrassments with the colonies. In the Cape of Good Hope, in Van Diemen's Land, and in other places, there prevailed a strong feeling of dissatisfaction, and in many of them the Government was accused of a direct breach of faith. After reviewing at some length the present condition of New Zealand, he concluded by expressing his disappointment at the speech of the noble Lord, and his dissatisfaction with the present line of colonial policy which the Government appeared to have resolved upon.

Mr. ANSTEY also objected to the plan of the Government for Van Diemen's Land, it being in his opinion most indesirable to have one-third of the council mere nominees of the Crown.

Mr. BAILLIE commented upon the constitution which the Colonial Government had selected for British Guiana; the Government of that settlement had stated, according to the noble Lord, that the number of electors had increased as well as the population. Now he would leave it to anyone in judging how far this was the case when he stated that there were but two voters in the province of Essequibo —the gaoler and the clerk of the court. The Attorney-General was the candidate, and was proposed by the gaoler, seconded by the clerk of the court, and, of course, returned, because there was no one else in the province. (A laugh)

Mr. LABOUCHERE referred to the statements made in the Sydney Morning Herald and the Port Philip Colonist, for the purpose of showing that the proposition of the Government had given unqualified satisfaction to the colonists As an abstract principle, he was in favour of three estates in the government of a country, and it was only in deference to the understood wishes of the Australian colonists that the Government had departed from that principle in the bill which was about to be introduced into that House. He was ready to admit that errors had arisen, which were in some measure inseparable from the constitution of the Colonial Office. He believed it to be the interest of the country and of the Colonies would be consulted by adopting the course suggested by his noble friend; and he hoped the House would give its unanimous sanction to the bill which he now prop. sed to introduce.

Mr. ROEBUCK found fault with the proposition of the Government as regarded the Australian colonies, and regretted that they had surrendered their better judgment to the opinion of a few of the colonists. He feared the council which was to be established would be so somewhat Conservative, and regretted there was not more uniformity in the plan which had been put forward. He thought the experiment of a single chamber would not work well

Mr. HAWES said the sense of the colony had been fairly taken with regard to the proposition of a single or a double chamber, and they had decided by a majority of two to one that a single chamber would best meet their wants and wishes. He would remind the House that the colony also had the power of altering the new constitution, if public opinion changed. It might be hereafter modified, and nothing, he thought, could more clearly mark the desire of the Government at home to defer to the wishes of the people of Australia. He did not want to disparage the exertions of the Colonial Reform Association, but he must, in justice to the Government, state, that these reforms and improvements had been planned and publicly announced long before that association was thought of. (Hear, hear.) He was glad to find that the measure of his noble friend, which was as large and liberal as it could well be framed, was likely to meet with the general concurrence of the House, and that these colonies would soon have the benefit of free and enlightened institutions, which had been found to work so well in the mother country.

Mr. GLADSTONE would not enter upon the extensive question of the general colonial policy of the Government, nor would he defend the Colonial Reform Association—although, he must say, that they were at least entitled to the credit of having given a useful stimulus to the proceedings of the Colonial Office. He (Mr. Gladstone) was desirous that that House should not commit any error in the (Hear, hear.) He was desirous that that House should not commit any error in the formation of this Australian constitution; but, while giving credit to the Government for its honesty and sincerity in the proposition of a single chamber, he feared that the system would not be found either satisfactory or confident. He feared that the system would not be found either satisfactory or confident. He feared also that the remedy provided by the bill would be found inoperative in the event of the colonists wishing to have an upper elective chamber. Mr. Hawes had stated that the Governor of Van Diemen's Land had given an opinion in favour of a single Chamber; but in the month of July last the Governor had written home a most strenuous recommendation in favour of a second upper chamber; and so far the hon. gentleman had entirely mistaken the feeling of that colony. He thought it right to point out these defects in the proposition of the Government, which otherwise met with his general approval.

After a few words of explanation from Mr. HAWES,

Mr. HUME wished to say a few words upon one of the most important debates that had taken place in that House for many years. If fully carried out, it would effect a considerable reduction in the expenses of the mother country, and would tend to promote the prosperity of the colonies. He congratulated the noble Lord on the statement he had submitted to the House, and hoped it would be carried out to its fullest extent.

Mr. ADDERLEY said the only ground on which the distinctions between the constitutions of the Cape of Good Hope and for the Australian colonies had been defended by the Under-Secretary for the Colonies, had been shewn to be utterly untenable. The Cape of Good Hope had, in his opinion, obtained the best constitution, because it had shown the most spirit in resisting the Government at home; and that, he thought, was like holding out an inducement to other places to do likewise. It had been assumed that the present proposition of the Government was a sort of concession to popular clamour, but he did not think such was the case. It was a simple reparation of rights to which British subjects abroad were as much entitled as British subjects at home, and on these grounds he would give the measure his support.

Mr. ADLIONBY defended the conduct pursued by the Colonial Reform Association, and denied that they had acted in any way that would falsely bring them under the censure of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. On the contrary, he maintained that it had done good service to the colonies, by hastening the proceedings of the Government, and compelling them the sooner to mature their plan, and bring it before the House. He was somewhat disappointed that what was considered the model form of government for the Cape of Good Hope, was not to be one, which was to be applied to the Cape of Good Hope, but to the Australian colonies. He referred to the colony of New Zea and in particular, the history of which was one of disappointment and persecution, and trusted that a more liberal and enlightened system of policy would now beadopted by the Government.

Mr. J. SCOTT ridiculed the idea of the members of her Majesty's Government relying upon a passage in the Sydney Morning Herald as a justification for their establishing a single elective chamber instead of a double one. He did not think they were justified in throwing upon the people of New South Wales the onus of having given their assent to a single chamber. So far as he knew anything of the sentiments of the colonists, they were decidedly opposed to having the unnatural one of the Crown sitting in either chamber He believed the Colonial Reform Association deserved the thanks of that House for having brought about the present concession from the Colonial Office; and to them was mainly attributable the putting an end to the state of alarm and disturbance that prevailed in so many of the colonies up to a recent period. It was admitted by the noble Lord that it was to the mismanagement and the serious errors of former ministers that they owed the loss of their North American Colonies, but the same vacillating and vexatious and contradictory system of policy had been applied to the Canadas, to the Cape of Good Hope, and to Australia.

The resolution was then agreed to, and ordered to be reported on Monday next.

The County Cess (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

PARTY PROCESSIONS (IRELAND).

Sir W. SOMERVILLE obtained leave to bring in a Bill, the provisions of which were similar to the former one, to restrain Party Processions in Ireland.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL obtained leave to bring in a Bill to enable persons having limited interests in land in Ireland to make building and improving leases. Also, a Bill to facilitate and better secure the due Administration of Criminal Justice.—The bills were severally read a first time.

The House adjourned at half-past eleven o'clock.

THE NEW ARCTIC EXPEDITION THROUGH LANCASTER SOUND.—

We understand that it is probable that the vessel which shall command the new expedition for the search of Sir John Franklin by way of Lancaster Sound; but we believe the searching squadron will consist of two steam-vessels and two sailing-vessels, instead of four, as at first intended. It is said that the Monk, two screw-yard lighters. There is no truth in the statement at first current, that the vessels selected for the expedition, for they are amongst the very worst that could be thought of. It is more likely that the Assistance and the Acorn, 12, are the vessels selected for the service, and that the Monk will be one of the vessels Archer, now screw steam sloop, now at Sheerness, will be employed as a dockyard vessel. The expedition in which Mr. Penny (late the master of the Advice whaler) is to be employed, will be totally distinct from that of the Royal Navy, although having the same object in view—the relief of Franklin.

WRECK OF HER MAJESTY'S STEAM-PACKET "ONYX."—Intelligence has been received from Ostend of the running ashore, on Wednesday last, that place, of her Majesty's Dover mail steam-packet, Onyx, in endeavouring to make the harbour during the heavy prevailing gales. The passengers and mails were safely landed, but small hopes were entertained for the recovery of the vessel. The Onyx was commanded by Lieutenant Raymond. She is an iron vessel, built about four years since, has auxiliary of 125 horse-power, and cost about £12,580. The watchful and experienced commander superintending the steam-packet service at Dover, immediately on learning the accident, dispatched her Majesty's steam-packet Princess Alice to Ostend, with anchors, cables, &c., to render assistance.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

Our accounts of yesterday (Friday) from Paris represent the city as having resumed its wonted quietness, and all appearance of excitement and alarm as having ceased. The shops that were closed during the first days of the week were again opened, and business was transacted as usual.

Some agitation was felt at Lyons in consequence of the violent proceedings in Paris during the early part of the week, but no serious danger was anticipated.

At the meeting of the Assembly on Thursday, M. Richardet complained that the church had neglected of late in not calling M. de la Borde to order on the previous day for the wanton attack upon his character. The President justified his conduct by saying that he was unaware that any remark had been committed to which he could properly have enforced the rules of the Chamber. The subject then dropped. During the evening, a duel was arranged between the parties; but when the moment arrived for the combatants to enter the field, M. de la Borde refused to go there to fight with pistols, and retracted the offensive expressions. Thus the affair terminated. M. Coislin, lately wounded in a duel, was one of the seconds to M. de la Borde.

GREECE.

The representative of the Court of Athens at Paris has published several documents connected with the late dispute between England and Greece. The Foreign minister of Greece protests against the conduct of Admiral Parker in seizing vessels of the Greek navy, and in order to avoid disastrous consequences, the Foreign Minister beseeches the representatives of Russia and France to order the vessels of their respective countries which are in the neighbourhood of Greece to lend the latter nation their support and co-operation in meeting the urgent necessities of the Government.

PRUSSIA.

From Berlin, under date of the 6th, we learn that the King had taken the oath to the Constitution. After the King had taken his oath, the Ministers of State were sworn to the Constitution, which they did in saying, "I swear, so help me God!" after the reading of the formula. After this the members of both Houses advanced and took their oaths at the steps of the throne; and this solemn ceremony being over, his Majesty rose and retired.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

TRING, READING, AND BASINGSTOKE.—On Saturday, the Master in Chancery (Richards) declared a distribution of 10s. per share amongst the shareholders, out of the assets accruing from the winding-up of this company's affairs. A further return is expected.

DUNDALK AND BELFAST.—The third contract, from Dundalk to the Wellington Inn, near Newry, is now nearly ready to receive the permanent way; and were the Government loan obtained, the line to Portadown could be completed in less than twelve months.

BRIGHTON, LEWES, AND TONBRIDGE WELLS RAILWAY.—On Saturday the Master in Chancery (Sir William Horne) proceeded with a list of shareholders in the above company, and placed thereon contributories, liable to shareholders in the above company, and placed thereon contributories, liable to a pro rata payment in discharge of the liabilities, amounting to £5000, 1100 shareholders who had applied for shares, and had them allotted, but who had neither paid the deposit nor signed the deed of contract.

THE REPRESENTATION OF COLCHESTER.—The election of a member to serve in Parliament for the borough of Colchester, in the room of Sir G. H. Smyth, Bart., resigned, commenced on Thursday last, when Lord John Manners and Mr. George Musgrove Cooke, the barrister and author, were respectively put in nomination; and on a show of hands being taken, the choice was declared by the returning officer (the Mayor) to have fallen on the latter gentleman. A poll was, however, demanded by the friends of Lord John Manners.

HAMILTON'S celebrated DICTIONARY of 1200 MUSICAL TERMS, &c., newly edited by JOHN BISHOP, of Cheltenham. Price 1s
This, the Thirty-third Edition seems to us a marvel, where so many musical terms, phrases, and musical expressions have been found. We consider it the most useful book on music. matters extant. It ought to be in the hands of everybody, whether student, amateur, or professor."—The Leamington Magnet
A CATECHISM of the RUDIMENTS of MUSIC. By JAMES CLARKE. 1s.
"A book like this, which has reached the Fifth edition, proves how highly useful it has been to those who have the tuition of the young. To schools it is invaluable, and is quite superseding the use of others which have had their day and are almost obsolete, from the very fact of their not keeping pace with the present day."—Vide Leamington Magnet, Jan 17.
THE GIPSY'S LIFE is a JOYOUS LIFE. Song By F. FLOOD. Price 2s 6d.
"This is a joyous, rollicking song, characteristic of the wandering race who are known in it by name, and the composer has done his part to make really a very pretty picture, and is only equal to the quality of the concerts behind it."—Vide Bells Messenger, Jan. 15.
HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIANOFORTE. 4s.; Enlarged and Improved; the whole Fingered by CZERNY.
"The fifteenth edition of this instruction book is now before us; and we confess that we have never met with so much information at so small a price, or that has pleased us more. It leads the student from principle to be able to perform, not only with certainty, clearness, and precision, but with elegance. We are glad to find that it is more universally used than any other similar work of the kind."—Vide Leamington Magnet

THE LEVANTINE PARASOL
Reg stered, Act 8 & 7 Vict., c. 65.
Some time ago, a Member of the "Art-Union" Journal contributed a letter from a Lady on the Coast of Paraguay, the writer of which tastefully suggested that a great improvement might be made in their appearance, by shading in their Portraits the configuration of Flowers, instead of the antique Mushroom shape.
This suggestion, as far as is mechanically practicable, is carried out by the invention of the FLOR-FORM PARASOL, which exhibits, when open, the appearance of an expanded flower.
The FLORIFORM PARASOL may be purchased of all first-class Mercers and Parasol Makers throughout the Kingdom and colonies, of JOHN MORLAND and SON, Manufacturers, 20, Ratcliffe, London-bridge.

THE LAST WEEK'S SALE of MESSRS. BEECH and BERNALL'S VALUABLE WINTER STOCK, at an enormous reduction from the original cost, in order to make room for the extensive purchases for the Spring Trade.
